Authorization given by commission to railroad to pledge bonds to government subject to government's right under former pledge, constituted authorization for first pledge—Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., C.C.A. Minn., 52 F.2d 418.

98. Pledge held good in equity
Where it was provided in mortgage that certain quantity of bonds should be reserved and that they should be issued in exchange for prior bonds when presented, pledge by railroad of bonds as security for note which was used to take up prior bonds would be regarded as good in equity because effecting the same result as an exchange, although the form of achieving that result was improper.—Ewen v. Peoria & E. Ry. Co., D.C. N.Y., 34 F.Supp. 332, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 138, 311 U.S. 700, 85 L. Ed. 454—Gilbert v Peoria & E. R. Co., D.C.N.Y., 34 F.Supp 332, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 138, 311 U.S 700, 85 L.Ed. 454.

sary party to a suit to determine the validity of a pledge of the bonds by the company in which there is no controversy as to the validity of the mortgage or as to the enforcement of any right or remedy under such mortgage [99]

c. Price and Consideration

A sale of railroad bonds at less than par value is illegal where restrained or prohibited by charter or statutory provisions.

Where statutory authority therefor exists, bonds may be disposed of at less than par value,[1] and even in the absence of such statutory recognition the validity of bonds sold at a small discount has been upheld to the extent of the amount paid.[2] A railroad company authorized to sell its bonds at a discount may receive in payment therefor construction material as well as cash.[3] On the other hand, a sale at a discount is illegal where it is restrained or prohibited by charter or statutory provisions.[4] A statutory provision that bonds may be sold, negotiated, mortgaged, or pledged at not less than a certain per cent on the dollar has been construed to render invalid as to an excess a pledge of bonds to secure certain notes where the amount received for the notes was less than such specified per cent of the total par value of the pledged bonds.[5]

d. Rights of Creditors against Subscribers to Bonds

Persons subscribing to railroad bonds are not liable to creditors of the company for the amounts unpaid on such subscriptions.

Where railroad mortgage bondholders subscribe to its debenture bonds and agree to pay specified portions of their subscriptions as called for, the transaction does not create a trust in favor of creditors of the railroad company,[6] and such bondholders do not thereby become liable to creditors of the company for the amounts unpaid on such agreement on the analogy of the liability of stockholders to the extent of unpaid stock subscriptions [7] Likewise, where the agreement is executory, such creditors have no remedy in equity to reach and apply the amount so due as property belonging to the debtor.[8]

General rules as to the rights of purchasers or pledgees of bonds apply to purchasers or pledgees of railroad bonds.

The general rules as to the rights of a purchaser or pledgee of bonds apply to purchasers or pledgees of bonds of a railroad company.[9] These rights may be varied by the special contract under which the bonds are acquired.[10] In the absence of the

Green Bay & W. R. Co., D.C.N.Y., 68 F.Supp. 509

Bonds of consolidated company

Where railroads consolidated under statute, purchasers of bonds of the consolidated railroad must be presumed to have known the law and to have purchased securities in the light of statutory provision that the constituent railroads should remain in being for purpose of meeting obligations of creditors and lienors—Smith v. Pacific Improvement Co., 172 N.Y.S. 65, 104 Misc. 481.

Rights against parent company

The holders of bonds issued by a railroad company, the proceeds of which were used for the construction of its road, are not creditors legally or equitably of another corporation which owned the majority of the stock of the railroad company—Male v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 129 N.E. 458, 230 N.Y. 158, 15 A.L.R. 1098.

bondholders' consent, the railroad company, after bonds secured by a mortgage have been issued, cannot by contract confer on a third person the right to share with the bondholders in the proceeds of the mortgaged property,[11] nor in general can it, by an agreement with one who takes its bonds, give such taker rights prejudicial to other holders of the same series.[12] The right of holders of bonds to attack an agreement between various companies, made prior to the issuance of such bonds and in furtherance of which such bonds were issued, has been denied[13]

Mutual rights. In accordance with general rules and subject to applicable limitations and exceptions, in the case of bonds secured by a mortgage, in general a particular bondholder is entitled to no rights superior to those of other bondholders of the same class[14] or of others in interest,[15] and, in the absence of authority contained in a statute or in a provision of the mortgage, a majority of the bondholders cannot take any action which will bind a minority without the consent of the latter.[16]

Rights affected by provisions of mortgage or trust deed. In accordance with general rules, the rights of the holders of bonds secured by mortgage are governed to some extent by the provisions of the mortgage or trust deed[17] especially where, by express reference, the terms of the mortgage or trust deed are incorporated into the bond.[18]

Stock pledged as security for bonds. A railroad company issuing bonds secured by a pledge of stock of another company under its management as majority stockholder is under a fiduciary obligation, which its bondholders may enforce, to handle honestly the affairs of each company and to exercise honest judgment and good faith to preserve the stock interest inviolate.[19]

Right of bondholders to register and vote at corporate meetings. General rules as to the right of bondholders to vote at stockholders' meetings, discussed in Corporations § 548, apply in the case of railroad companies,[20] and the rights of bondholders in this respect are regulated by their contracts and the governing statutes[21] The right to vote cannot be given to bondholders where it is inconsistent with, or contrary, to the constitution or the railroad company's charter or other governing statute[22]

b. Bona Fide Holders; Notice

Negotiable railroad bonds, valid on their face, are good in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value as against secret equities and defenses otherwise available to the railroad company or others.

Negotiable railroad bonds, valid on their face, are good in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value as against secret equities and defenses otherwise available to the railroad company or others.[23] This is true with respect to defects or irregularities in their issuance or application such as to make them voidable or inoperative in the hands of the original taker.[24] Such a holder, in the absence of notice to the contrary, has a right to assume that all charter

Sale including coupons
If bonds are sold and pass into the hands of a bona fide holder on the supposition that the sale covers all coupons attached and detached and not paid and canceled, past-due detached coupons in the hands of one not an innocent purchaser for value must be considered as passing to such bona fide holder.—Chicago, etc., R. Information not matter of public record
Since the information with respect to the manner of issuing bonds was not a matter of public record, guarantor and consolidated corporation of which guarantor was one of the constituents would be estopped to set up any mere irregularity in issuance of bonds as against an innocent purchaser for value—Frank v. New York, C. & St. L R. Co., 24 N.Y S 2d 846, 175 Misc. 902, affirmed 24 N.Y. S.2d 854, motion denied New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Frank, 61 S.Ct.

and statutory requirements in respect of the issuance and application of the bonds have been complied with.[25] In accordance with this principle, railroad bonds are valid in the hands of such a purchaser, although they were issued in violation of restrictions in the charter,[26] especially where such restrictions are for the benefit of stockholders and they make no objection to the issuance or application,[27] or although they were issued[28] or used[29] for an unauthorized purpose, or although the proceeds were misapplied.[30] On the other hand, holders of nonnegotiable railroad bonds take them subject to all defenses, legal and equitable, of the company which issues them.[31]

Who are bona fide holders; notice. In accordance with general rules and subject to applicable qualifications and limitations, a person is a bona fide holder of railroad bonds who takes the bonds before maturity for a valuable consideration, supposing them to be valid and having no notice of matters affecting validity or title.[32] Except where fraud in the inception of the bonds is shown,[33] the presumption is that holders of negotiable bonds are bona fide holders for value,[34] especially where the recitals on the face of the bonds lull and satisfy inquiry.[35] However, where persons to whom bonds are issued have notice of facts showing illegality, such bonds are void in their hands,[36] and a purchaser of such bonds is bound to take notice of all facts affecting their validity which are apparent on the face of the bonds,[37] or which the circumstances attending their issuance or transfer, and which are sufficient to excite suspicion in the mind of a prudent person, call to his attention.[38] While the bonds may, by reference, so incorporate the terms or conditions of the mortgage or trust deed given as security as to constitute notice to the purchaser of such terms or conditions,[39] it has been held that a mere reference in the bond to the terms and conditions of the mortgage might properly be regarded as referring to the terms and conditions affecting the security, and that it did not constitute constructive notice of terms affecting the contract as expressed in the bond.[40] Where the bonds are issued under a public statute, every purchaser of such bonds is put on inquiry as to the terms of such statute and is bound at his peril to take notice of such terms.[41]

Purchaser from bona fide holder. One acquiring railroad bonds from a bona fide holder acquires all the latter's rights and will be protected even though he himself is not a holder without notice.[42]

c. Modification of Contract by Reorganization Plan

Except where such authority is given by statute or by the instrument creating the trust, the trustee and some of the bondholders may not enter into an agreement or scheme of reorganization, without foreclosure, to the prejudice of nonassenting bondholders.

In accordance with general rules and subject to applicable qualifications and limitations, every railroad bondholder secured by a mortgage is equally entitled under the agreement made with him to be protected in all the advantages legally secured by it, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, and, except where such authority is given by statute[43] or by the instrument creating the trust,[44] no agreement or scheme of reorganization, without foreclosure, may be entered into by a trustee and some of the bondholders which would prejudicially affect the rights of nonassenting bondholders.[45]

d. Powers, Acts, and Proceedings of Committees or Agents for Bondholders

The validity of acts or contracts of committees or agents for bondholders depends on the terms of the agreement by which authority is conferred on them, and generally the bondholders are bound by acts of such a committee within the scope of its authority.

Where the holders of railroad bonds enter into an agreement by which they authorize a committee or agent to represent them in exchanging or disposing of their bonds or in otherwise representing their rights, the validity of the acts or contracts of such committee or agent in representing them will depend on the terms of the agreement by which the authority is given,[46] and in general the bondholders are all bound by the acts of such a committee within the scope of its authority.[47] Where a reorganization committee is vested with title to bonds, and, in assuming to act under the agreement, uses the bonds for a purpose within the general scheme of the agreement, it is not chargeable as for a conversion merely because it disregards a detail of the agreement.[48]

e. Exchange or Conversion of Bonds

(1) In general

(2) Bonds convertible into stock

(1) In General

General rules as to exchange or conversion of issues apply to the exchange or conversion of railroad bonds, and governing constitutional and statutory provisions must be observed.

General rules as to exchange or conversion of issues, discussed in Corporations § 1166, apply to the exchange or conversion of railroad bonds,[49] and governing constitutional and statutory provisions must be observed.[50] The rights and liabilities of bondholders under an agreement providing for the refunding of their indebtedness and the substitution of new for old bonds depend on the terms of the agreement.[51] Thus, under an agreement by a holder of railroad bonds to surrender them on receipt of other new bonds, the railroad company is not bound to deliver the stipulated new bonds until all of the outstanding old bonds are surrendered to it,[52] or their absence accounted for and adequate security offered to indemnify the company against liability to any adverse claimant,[53] even though a decree entered by the consent of the parties has directed a cancellation of the old bonds and a discharge of the mortgage securing them.[54] Where the surrender of the old bonds is not dependent on any contingency, and is without reservation, the bondholder thereby gives up his lien under the old mortgage and takes one under the new mortgage.[55] A bondholder who has not consented to, and has not made, an exchange,

Third-party beneficiary contract; rescission

Where series of transactions and agreements between railroads under which one of railroads agreed to issue new series of bonds and to exchange old bonds for those of new series made it reasonably clear that holders of old bonds were intended to be third-party beneficiaries, in the absence of fraud or bad faith or other facts showing inequity, the railroads could legally rescind the agreement to exchange so as to destroy the right of bondholders to exchange; and, in passing on the legality of the rescission, equities existing at the time of the rescission, and not those which may have existed at some time prior thereto, are the ones which must be considered.—McCulloch v. may not claim any greater rights than those to which he is entitled under his old contract.[56] Merely because it is planned to substitute scrip convertible into bonds for certain outstanding coupons of prior bonds, the holders of such prior bonds acquire no right to have such scrip issued or any vested interest in a mortgage executed in order to secure such scrip and bonds, where the latter are destroyed without being issued and the mortgage released.[57]

Acceptance of receivers' certificates by bondholders does not, in the absence of an express or implied agreement to that effect, operate as a waiver of the lien of the bonds[58] or as a novation.[59]

Time for conversion. If the agreement giving an option to convert bonds does not specify the time when the option is to be exercised, it must be exercised within a reasonable time,[60] and if not seasonably asserted may be lost by laches.[61]

(2) Bonds Convertible into Stock

General rules as to the rights of holders of corporate bonds convertible into stock apply to railroad bonds thus convertible.

General rules as to the rights of holders of corporate bonds convertible into stock, discussed in Corporations § 1167, apply in respect of such convertible bonds of a railroad company.[62] A holder of such bonds is not a stockholder, or entitled to the rights of such, before a conversion has been made.[63] If the company refuses or fails to make the exchange on a proper demand, the bondholder may recover damages for a breach of the agreement[64] or in a proper case may sue in equity for specific performance.[65]

Who may exercise option. The option to convert is available only to the actual holder of the bonds, and only as long as he continues to be such.[66]

Time for conversion. This option must be exercised by the bondholder within the time specified in the controlling agreement,[67] or, if no time is specified, within a reasonable time.[68]

Effect of consolidation or transfer of railroad by sale or by purchase of stock. While it has been held that a holder of a bond convertible into stock may not be prevented by a consolidation from converting the bond,[69] there is authority for the view that in general the contract for conversion does not prevent the company from consolidating with another in such a way as to make performance impossible,[70] or from transferring its property to another company which acquires the stock of the transferor so as to make performance impossible,[71] and, where no arrangement is made for furnishing stock in the new company, a consolidation which terminates the existence of the old companies may be presumed to put an end to the right of bondholders to call for stock.[72] However, under particular statutes or agreements pursuant to which a consolidation was effected, it has been held that a holder of convertible bonds is entitled to a compliance with his contract by the new company,[73] and that on its refusal to comply he may recover the resultant damages;[74] or, where the consolidation is on terms of perfect equality, the new company is bound to deliver its own stock for such bonds on demand, or to pay the damages occasioned by a refusal.[75] A bond-

§ 254. Indemnity, Guaranty, and Suretyship

a. In general
b. Rights of holders of securities guaranteed

a. In General

As a general rule a railroad company has no power to enter into any contract or indorsement by which it becomes a guarantor or surety, or otherwise lends its credit to another person, except when expressly authorized to do so or the power is implied from its general powers.

As a general rule a railroad company, like other private corporations other than surety or guaranty companies, as discussed in Corporations §§ 1230-1234, has no power to enter into any contract or indorsement by which it becomes a guarantor or surety, or otherwise lends its credit to another person or company,[78] even though the railroad company may derive some indirect benefit from the guaranty,[79] except in so far as it is expressly authorized to do so by its charter or other statute,[80] or except where the power to do so is implied from the general powers of the company, as being necessary and proper to enable it to accomplish the objects for which it was created, and in the conduct of its business.[81] A railroad company authorized to aid another in the construction of its road may guarantee bonds of the other as a means of raising money for such purpose,[82] and a company which has power to receive and dispose of the securities of another company has power to guarantee such securities.[83] The power of a company which enters into a valid contract for the leasing and operating of the road of another company to guarantee the securities of such other company,[84] or interest on such securities,[85] as part of the consideration, has been upheld. A railroad company may guarantee aid bonds issued to it by a municipality, in respect of both principal[86] and interest.[87] The validity of a contract which is not in the strict sense a guaranty, but by which one railroad company promises to purchase the obligations of another railroad company in order to furnish funds for the payment of interest on the mortgage bonds of such other company if the latter is not able to meet such interest, and to pay to the trustee under the mortgage, out of the purchase price of the notes, sufficient to make up the interest payments, has been upheld,[88] even though it required such purchases for an extended future period[89] and even after the mortgagor company might become insolvent.[90]

General rules as to the requisites, validity, and effect of guaranties apply in the case of a contract of guaranty when entered into by a railroad company.[91] According to some cases, where a guaranty, or a contract to give one, is for an unauthorized purpose, it is regarded as strictly ultra vires, unlawful, and void,[92] and incapable of being made good by ratification or estoppel,[93] at least where the benefits received by the guarantor are merely an incidental, and not a direct, result of the guaranty.[94] It has been held that the opinion of a state commission in the matter of authorizing railroads to guarantee bonds of another company may not validate corporate action which, as to the state or stockholders, is invalid.[95]

Statutory prohibitions. Under a statute so providing, a railroad company, except as authorized in the statute, may not, directly or indirectly, guarantee the bonds of any other corporation.[96] Such statutory prohibition applies to domestic corporations,[97] but not to foreign corporations.[98]

Acquisition of securities by director of guarantor company. While the opinion has been expressed that a statute providing that all securities of a company purchased from the company by a director thereof, either directly or indirectly, for less than the par value, shall be null and void applies to securities guaranteed by such company,[99] the right of the company to recover from the director who takes such securities at less than par the difference between the par value and the amount paid by him, has been denied.[1]

b. Rights of Holders of Securities Guaranteed

General rules governing the rights of a guarantee have been applied in determining the rights of holders of railroad bonds under contracts of guaranty, and an unconditional transfer of bonds while a guaranty thereof is in force carries with it the rights incident to the guaranty.

General rules governing the nature and extent of a guarantor's liability and the corresponding rights of a guarantee or creditor, as discussed in Guaranty §§ 43–66, have been applied in determining the rights of holders of railroad bonds under contracts of guaranty.[2] It has been held that bondholders for whose benefit a contract of guaranty is made, although not parties to the agreement and even though not furnishing the consideration therefor, may enforce the guaranty.[3] An unconditional transfer of bonds while a guaranty thereof is still in force carries with it rights incident to the guaranty.[4] While it has been held that where a contract of guaranty is strictly ultra vires all purchasers of the securities guaranteed are chargeable with notice of the railroad company's want of power and cannot enforce the guaranty,[5] where the guaranty is merely voidable by reason of some irregularity in the exercise of the power, or, in other words, where it is ultra vires as between the corporators only because it is in violation of their rights, or because of some defect in the contract which may not be binding on the corporation, the guaranty, although invalid in the hands of a holder with notice,[6] is good and enforceable in the hands of a bona fide holder without notice.[7] In such cases both the company as an entity and the stockholders as such may be estopped to repudiate the guaranty as against one who has made investments and acted on the faith of such guaranty;[8] but it has been held that the claim that the stockholders of the guarantor company consented to the contract of guaranty may not successfully be interposed on behalf of holders of guaranteed bonds where a single individual owned most of the stock of both companies concerned and initiated and controlled the transaction for his own benefit.[9]

Even though the guaranty is ultra vires, the right of the holders of the securities to the benefit of a fund created as an incident to the guaranty has been recognized.[10] A guaranty by one railroad company of the bonds of another, owned by the guarantor, is obligatory in favor of the purchaser of the bonds, on the faith of the guaranty, notwithstanding the guaranty may, in its inception, have been ultra vires.[11] It has been held that one who takes the bonds of a railroad company on which is indorsed a guaranty of their payment by another railroad company is put on inquiry as to the relations between the companies which would reveal that the property of the company issuing the bonds has been leased to the company guaranteeing their payment.[12] Some contracts have been construed as imposing a duty on a company which agrees to furnish funds for payment of interest on the mortgage bonds of another company as imposing a direct duty on the promisor company to pay to or through, the mortgage trustee sufficient funds to pay the interest on the mortgage bonds if the mortgagor company does not make provision therefor.[13]

§ 255. Liens Generally

Particular matters with respect to liens on railroad property are discussed in the sections immediately following.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 256. —— Creation and Existence in General

A purely statutory lien must be secured in the manner provided by statute and a statute precluding a railroad from creating a lien which shall be valid against certain classes of claims does not create a lien in favor of such claims.

A purely statutory lien must be secured in the manner provided by the statute for that purpose.[14] A statute which precludes a railroad company from creating a lien which shall be valid and binding as against certain enumerated classes of claims does not create a lien in favor of such claims.[15]

The validity and effect of railroad liens are determined by the law of the place where the property is situated on which the liens are sought to be enforced.

§ 259. —— Loss or Waiver of Lien

a. In general
b. Liens for public aid granted

a. In General

The loss or waiver of a lien on railroad property is, in the absence of statute, regulated by the rules governing liens generally.

The loss or waiver of a lien on railroad property is, in the absence of statute, regulated by the rules governing liens generally.[20] A contractual waiver of the right to a lien should be in clear, certain, and unequivocal language.[21] A mechanic's lien on railroad property may be waived or lost by the acceptance of other security for the claim.[22] However, a contract for such security has the effect of a waiver only on the performance of the contract,[23] and where the contract is inconsistent with an intent to retain the lien,[24] or, in some jurisdictions, only where it appears affirmatively that there was an intent to look to such security and not to the lien.[25] A subcontractor's lien, under some statutes, is independent of that of the principal contractor or of its waiver or loss.[26] A provision for the creation of a particular fund, out of which payments under the contract are to be made, is not the giving of collateral security depriving the contractor of the right to a lien.[27]

The priority of a statutory lien may be lost by the failure of the claimants to proceed to enforce it in the manner and within the time prescribed by the statute.[28] So, where a note for the debt on which a lien claim is based is taken, which is not payable until after the expiration of the statutory limitation of time for enforcement of the lien, it will be deemed that the lien is waived.[29] While a statutory lien may not follow the claim into the hands of a purchaser thereof, as discussed infra § 279, such a parting with title as to result in the loss of a laborer's lien is not shown by the fact that in delivering his claim to a third person for collection the lienor indorses the claim as evidence of the authority to collect and borrows a small sum thereon.[30] Where a payment by the railroad to a firm of subcontractors left a balance due to them from the general contractor equal to the amount of lienable demands, for labor performed for the subcontractors, a firm of labor claimants is not estopped to assert its lien, notwithstanding a member of the firm was also a member of the firm of subcontractors and, as such, agreed to apply the payment to the discharge of labor claims.[31]

b. Liens for Public Aid Granted

A lien in favor of the state for public aid granted to a railroad ordinarily may be released or waived by the state, by an act of the legislature, foreclosure, or by compromise.

A lien in favor of a state for public aid granted to a railroad company ordinarily may be released or waived by the state, by an act of the legislature,[32] or by a foreclosure under the statute;[33] or such release may be accomplished by way of a compromise, notwithstanding a constitutional prohibition against a release.[34] If a lien attaches in favor of the state alone, it may be released or postponed by the state, although the bonds which the lien secures are outstanding and unpaid;[35] but where such lien also attaches in favor of the bondholders it cannot be waived or postponed by the state alone.[36]

§ 260. —— Judgment Liens

A judgment against a railroad becomes a lien on its realty in the same manner as a judgment against a natural person.

A judgment against a railroad company becomes a lien on its road and realty in the same manner as a judgment against a natural person,[37] and cannot be displaced by the act of the railroad.[38] Where a judgment is recovered against the railroad company after its road has been sold under a mortgage foreclosure and the sale confirmed,[39] or after its entire equity of redemption has been extinguished by such a sale, and its property and franchises are in the entire possession and control of the purchaser as owner,[40] it does not become a lien at law on the road,[41] nor is it a lien in equity on the fund arising from the sale where the proceeds are less than the mortgage debt.[42]

§ 261. —— Liens for Right of Way or Land Granted

A vendor of land to a railroad for a right of way or other purpose is entitled to the same lien on the land sold for the unpaid purchase money as an ordinary vendor.

In accordance with the general rules governing vendors' liens, a vendor of land to a railroad company for a right of way or other purpose is entitled to the same lien on the land sold for the unpaid purchase money as an ordinary vendor.[43] This lien attaches as well where the sale is by operation of law as where it is by voluntary contract,[44] and attaches against the vendee and all subsequent purchasers with notice.[45] No lien attaches however, where the vendor accepts other security therefor with the intention to rely solely on it for payment.[46] It has been held that a lien for right of way is on the whole line of road and not only on the particular parcel sold.[47]

§ 262. —— Liens for Rolling Stock

Contracts reserving title or a lien on rolling stock furnished to a railroad are valid, subject to compliance with the requirements, if any, imposed by statute, such as filing or recording.

Contracts reserving title or a lien on rolling stock furnished to a railroad company are valid, subject to compliance with the requirements, if any, imposed by statute,[48] such as filing or recording.[49]

Car trust. A "car trust" has been defined as an association of capitalists formed to buy and sell rolling stock, usually for a particular road;[50] an association formed for the purpose of owning freight cars and leasing them to railroad companies.[51]

Car trust securities are a common form of financial securities, so called, from the fact that title to railroad rolling stock is placed, by bailment or sale, in one or more individuals in trust and certificates of ownership in the property issued to the persons investing their money on the faith of the property and the promise of the railroad company to pay for it;[52] a lien in the nature of a mortgage on the rolling stock of a railroad, usually to secure its purchase price.[53]

§ 263. —— Liens for Loans or Advances

In the absence of a statute providing therefore, or of circumstances giving rise to a lien under general equitable principles, an advance or loan of money to a railroad will not give rise to a lien.

eral equitable principles, an advance or loan of money to a railroad will not give rise to a lien.[54] However, the circumstances attending an advance or loan to a railroad company may be such as to impose a lien on its property for the amount thereof,[55] as where it is made under an agreement that the loan shall be secured by a mortgage or deed of trust on the property.[56] Where, under an arrangement scaling down a railroad company's indebtedness, a creditor surrenders his bonds and receives new ones for all except a small portion of the reduced indebtedness to him, it has been held that he is entitled to a lien equal to that of other bond and mortgage creditors for the whole amount due him.[57] However, an agreement by a railroad company to prefer its bondholders in the disposition of a certain fund has been held to give them no lien on such fund.[58]

§ 264. —— Liens for Damages

Under some statutes a person is entitled to a lien for any loss or damage to the person or property sustained from a railroad on his compliance with statutory requirements, and where a railroad breaches a covenant in a grant of land the grantor may be entitled to a lien for the resulting damage.

Under some statutes a person is entitled to a lien for any loss or damage to the person or property sustained from a railroad on his compliance with the statutory requirements.[59]

Damages for breach of covenant. Where a railroad fails to perform covenants which it has entered into in connection with a grant of land to it for railroad purposes, the grantor may be entitled to a lien in the nature of a vendor's lien for the resulting damages,[60] as, for example, where the railroad fails to construct its road in the manner agreed on,[61] or fails to fence and build crossings along or over the right of way,[62] although a failure to build fences as agreed on does not entitle such owner to a lien for a trespass outside the right of way[63] or for damages caused by negligent construction of the road.[64] It has been held that this lien is confined to that portion of the road covered by the contract.[65]

§ 265. —— Liens for Public Aid Granted

Where the federal or state government grants aid to a railroad company, it does not thereby acquire a lien on the property of the railroad in the absence of a statute providing otherwise.

Where the federal or state government grants aid to a railroad company by guaranteeing its bonds or by authorizing an issuance of federal, state, or county bonds in aid of the company, it does not

Main purpose of statute granting lien against railroad for loss or damage to person or property, superior to that of mortgagees and other secured creditors was to prevent the worthy, and in many respects defenseless, classes of persons named therein from being deprived of damages suffered by reason of negligence of railroad operators by having their claims made secondary to those of mortgage creditors and other secured creditors.—Thompson v. Glover, C.C.A.Mo., 94 F.2d 544.

Claim held not merged in judgment so as to work loss of right to lien.—Thompson v. Evans, C.C.A. Mo., 113 F.2d 794.

Limitation

(1) A provision in a statute conferring a lien, requiring that suit shall be brought on the claim or that the claim shall be filed with a receiver within a year, creates a condition on the performance of which the right to the lien rests
U.S.—Thompson v. Evans, supra.
Ark.—St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Ingram, 187 S.W. 452, 124 Ark. 298.

(2) Such suit may be brought within time limited in any court of competent jurisdiction, notwithstanding such court is not a court having jurisdiction to declare or enforce liens on railroad property within the state in which the lien arises.—Thompson v. Evans, supra.

Mentioning lien in judgment

Statutory requirement that lien be mentioned in judgment rendered for claimant, has been held to be addressed to court rather than to injured person and requirement, even though imperative in form, is directory in nature and does not cause injured person to forfeit his right if court fails to make entry.—Thompson v. thereby acquire a lien on the property of the railroad company[66] unless the statute authorizing such guaranty or issue expressly provides for such a lien[67] or the terms of the statute are such as clearly show an intention that such a lien should be created.[68]

Nature and extent of lien. The nature and extent of such a lien depend on the wording of the statute under which it arises.[69] It has been held that the lien operates as a specific appropriation of the property of the company to the payment of the bonds, on default of principal and interest[70] and is not restricted to the portion of the road then finished, or to the property then owned by the company, but extends to the entire road, its franchises, and all the property then belonging to it or afterward acquired.[71]

Persons entitled to benefit of lien. Where bonds are issued by a state in aid of a railroad company, it has been held that such bonds become the debt of the state and the statutory lien in its favor does not inure to the benefit of bona fide holders of such bonds[72] unless the terms of the statute extend such lien to them;[73] nor does an indorsement by a railroad company of such bonds give a lien to holders thereof.[74] On the other hand, it has been held that, since a creditor is entitled to all securities or franchises which the surety may receive from the principal debtor, the statutory lien arising on an indorsement of railroad bonds by the state is a security for the payment of the indorsed bonds and operates as a specific appropriation of the property and franchises of the railroad company to their payment which the bondholders may enforce whenever default shall be made by the company in the payment of the principal or interest.[75] The summary remedies given by statute for the enforcement of the liens of the state to secure it against loss by reason of its indorsement of the bonds of a railroad company can be exercised only by the state;[76] but, where the state has failed to exercise such remedies and disclaims its liability for the indorsed bonds, such statutes afford no obstacle to a resort to a court of equity by the bondholders for the enforcement of the statutory lien for their benefit,[77] and the fact that the state cannot be made a party to the suit, no relief being asked against it, does not affect the jurisdiction of the court or the equity of the bill.[78] Where such bonds, issued in exchange for railroad bonds secured by a statutory mortgage, are declared invalid, the holders of the bonds may, in equity, enforce the mortgage for their own benefit.[79]

§ 266. —— Liens for Traffic Balances

Under a statute so providing, a lien exists in favor of a railroad company on the property of a connecting railroad for traffic balances due.

Under a statute so providing, a lien exists in favor of one railroad company on the property of a connecting railroad company for a balance due from the latter under a traffic agreement for the interchange of business.[80]

§ 267. Liens for Labor or Supplies

In the absence of statutory provision therefor, ordinarily a lien for labor or supplies will not arise against the property of a railroad company since it is imbued with a public interest.

Under the general rule that property affected with a public use is not subject to a mechanic's lien, as discussed in Mechanics' Liens § 11, ordinarily, and in the absence of statutory provision therefor, a mechanic's lien cannot be acquired or enforced against the property of a railroad,[81] and, in the absence of a statute authorizing such a lien, no lien arises from the mere fact that material sold for the purpose is used in the construction of a railroad.[82] On the other hand, independently of statute, a person selling goods to a railroad company may have a lien thereon for the unpaid purchase money as long as he retains actual or constructive control of the goods;[83] or an equitable lien for services or supplies furnished may arise by virtue of the contract between the railroad company and the person furnishing them.[84]

Under some statutes a lien may attach to the property of a railroad for labor and materials.[85] Statutes giving to every mechanic, builder, artisan, workman, or other person who shall do or perform any work or labor on or furnish any materials, machinery, fixtures, or other things toward the equipment or to facilitate the operation of a railroad a paramount lien therefor on the roadbed and other property of the company, are intended to protect laborers and persons furnishing materials for the construction and repair of railroads,[86] and to give a security for the debt.[87] The existence and extent of such lien therefor, being in derogation of the common law, must depend wholly on the provisions of the statute,[88] which must be strictly construed in respect, at least, of the ascertainment of the rights of the parties entitled,[89] although, where the lien has once attached, the statute should be liberally construed as to its remedial part.[90] According to other authorities, statutes of the character under consideration are to be liberally construed to advance their objects,[91] although they should not be extended to cases not reasonably within their purview.[92]

Since the statute itself fixes the limit beyond which the right to a lien does not exist,[93] and presupposes a right of action in the person claiming the lien, the lien is not intended to confer a right of action where none existed without it.[94] Likewise, the lien does not exist for claims not provided for by the statute,[95] such as a claim for damages arising from a breach of contract.[96] Where, however, the statute applies, a debt in whatever shape it may be has the benefit of the lien given by the statute,[97] and may be enforced against a purchaser of the railroad within the time limited by statute for its enforcement, although such purchaser's title was acquired without notice of the lien.[98] A statute creating a lien does not, in the absence of express provision therefor, create a personal liability against the owner of the property.[99]

Railroads to which applicable. A statute comferring a lien on subcontractors, laborers, materialmen, etc., in the construction of a railroad is applicable to a railroad constructed by a corporation for the conveyance of materials, etc., incidental to its main business,[1] even though the owner of the railroad is not incorporated.[2]

Ordinarily statutes conferring liens on railroad property for labor or supplies are not accorded a retroactive effect.

Ordinarily, a statute giving a lien against the property of a railroad for labor or supplies relates only to the labor and materials furnished after its passage and gives no right to a lien for labor and materials furnished before it was enacted.[3] It does not give a lien for labor or supplies furnished under a contract executed prior to its passage,[4] although the labor or materials were furnished after the statute took effect.[5] On the other hand, it has been held that a lien may be had for labor, although the contract was entered into before the taking effect of the lien law,[6] and that, although the contract is entered into prior to the passage of such a statute, if the property subject to such lien was not in existence when the statute was enacted, but only comes into existence afterward by labor and supplies furnished under the contract, the person furnishing such labor and supplies is entitled to a lien under the statute, and that such application of the statute invades no right of property.[7]

§ 269. —— Applicability of General Lien Laws

General lien laws have been held inapplicable to liens against railroads, and, in the absence of a clear legislative intent to the contrary, a mechanics' lien law will not be construed to provide for liens on railroad property.

General lien laws have been held inapplicable to liens against railroads,[8] and, although a statute may expressly provide for such liens on a railroad,[9] or its language or intent may clearly include railroads,[10] such construction will not be put on a general mechanics' lien law unless the language of the statute clearly requires it to be done.[11]

§ 270. —— Inception and Duration of Lien

Ordinarily a lien for labor and materials expended on a railroad originates as an inchoate lien on the commencement of the work, and continues as such until perfected in the manner prescribed by statute.

The commencement and duration of the lien are regulated by the statute.[12] Ordinarily, the lien originates as an incipient or inchoate lien with the beginning of the work,[13] or with the delivery of the materials, as discussed infra § 273, and continues as such until perfected, in the manner prescribed,[14] or until it is lost by a failure to comply with statutory requirements within the prescribed time.[15] A provision that a lien shall cease to be operative in a certain time, if no steps are taken to enforce it, is in the nature of a statute of limitations and is not available to defeat the lien unless pleaded.[16]

As a general rule, privity of contract between the claimant and the railroad is essential to creation of a lien against the property of the latter.

In the absence of a provision of the statute to the contrary, privity of contract between the lien claimant and the railroad is essential,[17] and the right to a lien does not arise merely because the alleged work or materials furnished inure to the benefit of the company.[18] A contract, such as is required to support a laborer's or mechanic's lien, need not, unless the statute so requires, be express or in writing, but may be oral or implied.[19] A provision in the principal contract, making certain requirements as to the form of subcontracts, is not applicable to agreements between the contractor and persons hired for manual, machine, or team labor.[20] A lien which is created by statute in favor of certain classes of persons only cannot be created by an express agreement of the parties alone.[21]

§ 272. —— Nature and Purpose of Labor, Material, or Expenditure

The right to a lien is ordinarily restricted to claims for labor performed or materials furnished for use in the construction or repair of the railroad, or which, although not actually incorporated in the road, is necessary for the work.

The right to a lien under statutes of the character under consideration rests on the theory that the labor or materials have gone into the building of the road and to that extent added to its value, and, therefore, a lien for such labor and material should be given to him who does the one or furnishes the other.[22] Accordingly, the right to such a lien is ordinarily restricted to claims for labor performed or materials furnished for use in the construction or repair of the road,[23] or which, although not actually incorporated in the road, is necessary for the work,[24] and a statute should not be extended to cases not reasonably within its intent.[25]

In application of these rules, it has been held that a lien cannot be had for money expended in acquiring a right of way,[26] paying salaries or expenses of a construction company,[27] paying a commission for guaranteeing a contract of such company,[28] or for hiring teams[29] It is also necessary that, in order that a person may be entitled to such a lien, the labor and materials be furnished in such a manner that the railroad company would be liable to pay the contractor or materialman for them[30] Such lien does not arise where the labor or material is furnished to a principal contractor in his individual capacity[31] A lien may be claimed for labor performed or material furnished on a part of the property only.[32]

Materials. The term "materials," within the meaning of such a statute, ordinarily applies only to articles entering into the construction of the road and thereafter invisible except as they survive in tangible results.[33] It does not apply to materials which, while used in the doing of the work, survive its performance and remain the property of the owner,[34] or which only very remotely enter into the construction of the road,[35] such as materials furnished to be used in the erection of boarding houses for men and stables for horses.[36] A lien for materials cannot, it has been held, be had for camp equipment furnished to a subcontractor,[37] or for teams,[38] or tools[39] used on the work, or for the rental thereof,[40] or for medical services rendered,[41] or for clothing or board furnished to laborers,[42] or for groceries and provisions furnished to a subcontractor,[43] or for food furnished for teams,[44] or for lubricating or illuminating oil for running the road,[45] or for coal furnished and used in the operation of machinery employed in railroad construction by the contractor,[46] although as to this last proposition there is also authority to the contrary.[47] On the other hand, under a statute conferring a lien for materials, a lien may be had for tools which are used and consumed in the construction of a work,[48] or for blasting powder and explosives used in the work,[49] or for lumber used in making forms for concrete work.[50]

Materials, supplies, or other articles. Under a statute conferring a lien on persons furnishing materials, supplies, or other articles necessary to the operation of a railroad, a railroad company may acquire a lien against another railroad for the use and hire of cars and equipment,[51] for coal,[52] for material used in repairing cars,[53] for the rental of a water tank,[54] for tariffs,[55] for material used in maintaining and operating a station,[56] but not for premiums on policies of fire insurance covering railroad property.[57]

Labor and wages. The term "labor" applies to manual labor of persons employed.[58] A foreman or superintendent, who performs some manual labor may be entitled to a lien as a laborer,[59] as may copartners who have entered into a contract for grading, upon which they work personally and employ teams and tools owned by them and also employ a number of laborers.[60] Legal services rendered by counsel cannot be regarded as labor within the meaning of a lien statute.[61] Under a statute making amounts due employees for wages a lien on the property of the railroad, one railroad is not entitled to a lien against the property of another railroad for the services of its agents and employees in the maintenance and operation of a joint station,[62] or for labor in repairing cars belonging to such other railroad,[63] or for an amount claimed for the switching of cars.[64] Where an employee is entitled to a lien for compensation, he may have a lien for expenses which are a part of his agreed compensation[65]

Profits. Under a statute giving a lien for labor performed and materials furnished, a contractor is entitled to a lien for his profit or compensation for the labor performed and material furnished.[66]

§ 273. —— Delivery and Use of Materials

The right to a lien against railroad property for materials ordinarily arises on their delivery.

The right to a lien for materials furnished arises as soon as the materials are delivered,[67] regardless of whether they are actually used in the construction of the road.[68] On the other hand, there can be no lien for materials contracted for and prepared but never delivered;[69] nor can a contractor have a lien for material lost by his negligence, although the title to it had passed to the company.[70]

§ 274. —— Place of Performance or Delivery

Ordinarily the right to a lien attaches to the whole, continuous line of railroad where the labor or material was furnished in two or more counties, and is not confined to the property in any one county.

The right to a lien is not confined to one county where the labor or material is furnished in two or more counties; but it fastens on the entire and continuous line of the road, and may be enforced in any of the counties through which the road runs.[71] Under some statutes it is not essential to the enforcement of the lien within a particular state that the labor be performed or the materials delivered within that state.[72]

§ 275. —— Time of Furnishing of Labor or Material

There can be no lien for items of claims not accruing within a period set by statute within which claims must accrue in order to be lienable.

Where a statute provides the period within which the claim must arise in order that it may be lienable, a lien cannot be had for items of claims not accruing within that period.[73]

§ 276. —— Amount of Lien

A claimant cannot become entitled to a lien for an amount greater than that due him under his contract.

The lien claimant cannot, in any event, be entitled to a lien for more than the amount due him under his contract.[74] Where a lien is afforded to subcontractors to the extent and value of the work and labor performed or materials furnished, the railroad is liable only for the value of the work and material, no matter what may be the price fixed by the contract between the principal contractor and subcontractor.[75] Where the statute provides that the liens of subcontractors, laborers, and materialmen shall not in the aggregate be for a greater amount than the contract price of the original contractor, and there are several subcontractors entitled to liens, the contract price should be apportioned among all of them according to the whole amount of their lienable claims, whether or not actually perfected.[76]

Under some statutes a subcontractor is not entitled to a lien unless it appears that there is something due or to become due from the railroad to the principal contractor when the lien is formally perfected.

Where the statute provides that the railroad shall not be liable for any greater sum than the amount actually due by the corporation to the original contractor, in order that a subcontractor may be entitled to a lien it must appear that there is something due or to become due the original contractor,[77] at the time of the giving of notice or the taking of other steps necessary to perfect the lien.[78] Where a statute confers a direct lien on a subcontractor, laborer, or materialman, it attaches on compliance with the statutory requirements without regard to payments which have been made to the principal contractor,[79] and, after it has attached, it cannot be defeated by a payment to the contractor;[80] and, where, under the statute, it attaches to the sum due at the time notice is given and to sums accruing thereafter, the rights of one furnishing material to a subcontractor are to be determined by the state of accounts between the railroad and the principal contractor, and not of the account between the contractor and subcontractor,[81] although as to this there is also authority to the contrary.[82] The fact that the railroad has paid to the contractor an amount exceeding that which is claimed by the subcontractor will not prevent the subcontractor from acquiring a lien on an unpaid balance due from the railroad to the contractor.[83] Where a payment by the contractor to the subcontractor is made directly from moneys paid by the railroad, it should be applied to lienable items of the subcontractor's account.[84]

§ 278. —— Property Subject to Lien

A lien for labor and materials ordinarily attaches to the whole road or the whole proceeds of a sale thereof; but the particular kind of railroad property included as lienable will depend on the provisions of the statute invoked.

As a general rule a statutory lien for labor and materials furnished to a railroad company attaches to the entire road or the proceeds of a sale thereof,[85] and cannot be enforced against a separate part of the road,[86] although such part may be all of the road which the lienor constructed or aided to construct.[87] This rule, however, is subject to the modification that the lien extends only to the completed portion of the road,[88] and not to a projected portion to be completed thereafter;[89] but the fact that the road as projected when the labor and materials are furnished is not fully completed will not defeat the lien.[90] Likewise the lien extends only to the interest in the road of the company by which the laborer or mechanic is employed.[91] Although the railroad has an interest less than a fee-simple title, it may be subject to a lien.[92]

A lien, conferred by a statute, attaches only to the property to which it is confined by the language of the statute.[93] Except where the statute provides otherwise,[94] such lien attaches only to real estate,[95] and does not attach to the rolling stock and other movables belonging to the company;[96] nor does it attach to the franchise of the company.[97] Under a statute providing that the lien shall attach to all property of the railroad, real, personal, and mixed, it attaches to the rolling stock.[98]

§ 279. —— Persons Entitled to Liens

a In general
b Contractors
c Subcontractors
d. Persons employed by, or otherwise dealing with, subcontractors
e. Laborers and others rendering services
f. Assignees or purchasers of claims

a. In General

Only the persons specified by the statute are entitled to claim a statutory lien against railroad property for labor or materials.

The persons who may claim a statutory lien for labor or material are to be determined by the proper construction of the statute under which the lien is claimed, and, unless claimant is within the class designated by the statutory provision under which he claims a lien, he is not entitled to such lien.[99] A mere creditor of one entitled to such a lien has no right to the lien, although money loaned by him may have been used to furnish the materials supplied to the railroad company.[1]

b. Contractors

Statutes creating liens in favor of laborers and materialmen have been construed not to apply in favor of contractors for the furnishing of labor and materials.

favor of contractors for the furnishing of labor and materials [2] However, contractors for the performance of work, including the furnishing of labor and materials, have been held to be within the intent of statutes conferring liens on anyone who shall perform any labor on, or for the benefit of, any railroad,[3] or on any mechanic, builder, artisan, workman, laborer, or other person who shall perform any work on any railroad,[4] or on mechanics, laborers, and operatives.[5] Where the statute provides that all persons who furnish labor, material, or teams shall be entitled to a lien, a contractor for the furnishing of labor, etc, may be entitled to a lien.[6]

Who are contractors. A contractor within the meaning of a statutory provision giving such lien to contractors is one who furnishes labor or materials under a contract directly with the railroad company or through a duly authorized officer or agent.[7]

c. Subcontractors

A subcontractor must bring himself within the terms of the lien statute in order to acquire a lien on railroad property.

A subcontractor, in order to acquire a lien, must bring himself within the provisions of a statute applicable to subcontractors,[8] and can have no lien under a statute providing for contractors only.[9] While it has been held that a subcontractor may have a lien under a statute conferring a lien on any mechanic, builder, artisan, workman, laborer, or other person who shall perform any work on any railroad,[10] or a statute conferring a lien on mechanics, laborers, and operatives,[11] it has been held to the contrary that subcontractors are not within the scope of the title of an act relating to the liens of mechanics, laborers, and materialmen,[12] and that a subcontractor procuring work to be done through the labor of others does not come within the provisions of a statute imposing a lien on railroad property for the protection of laborers and mechanics who may perform work with teams or tools in its construction or repair,[13] although he may have a lien for his own personal services and that of his teams and tools, as discussed infra subdivision e of the current section.

Who are subcontractors. A subcontractor, within the meaning of these statutes, is one who furnishes labor or material under a contract with the principal contractor.[14] One who merely hires or rents tools or equipment to one employed on the work does not thereby become a subcontractor and entitled to a lien for the value of the use of the tools or equipment;[15] nor is a person performing labor rendered a subcontractor because of the fact that his compensation is fixed by units of work performed.[16]

d. Persons Employed by, or Otherwise Dealing with, Subcontractors

Some statutes providing for liens on railroad property, while including subcontractors or persons furnishing labor or materials to the principal contractor, do not embrace one who furnishes labor or materials under a contract with a subcontractor, but other statutes extend the benefit of the lien to such persons.

There is some conflict among the authorities as to whether railroad lien laws protect only those dealing with a contractor or his subcontractor, or whether they extend to those dealing with a subcontractor of any degree.[17] Some statutes, while including subcontractors or persons furnishing labor or materials to the principal contractor, do not embrace one who furnishes labor or materials under a contract with a subcontractor.[18] Under other statutes, however, the lien is extended to subcontractors of the second,[19] or even third,[20] degree, and to persons doing labor for, or furnishing material to, either of these.[21] Where the statute requires the lien to be based on a contract with, or approved by, the railroad, one furnishing material under a contract with a third person having a contract with a subcontractor under the original contractor must show that the railroad approved the contract between himself and the third person.[22] One employed by a construction company may be regarded as employed at the instance of a contractor of the railway company, although the construction company was chartered and did considerable work before the railroad company obtained its charter, where the contract between the construction and the railroad companies covered the entire work of grading the road and thus related back, making the construction company the contractor of the railroad company from the beginning.[23]

e. Laborers and Others Rendering Services

While some lien laws are broad enough to provide liens for all persons furnishing valuable services to a railroad, ordinarily the terms of the statute are such that the lien is restricted to those furnishing manual labor.

Some statutes conferring liens of the character under consideration are sufficiently broad in their terms to include all persons rendering valuable services from which the railroad receives a benefit.[24] However, statutes affording a lien to persons performing labor or services are ordinarily construed to include only persons other than officers, managers, or general superintendents,[25] and to be intended to provide liens for those who actually perform manual labor, in the construction, repair, or operation of the road.[26]

Under the phraseology of the statute involved, and the construction placed thereon by the court, the railroad lien laws have been held to include the foreman or superintendent of a gang of laborers engaged in construction or repair work,[27] a civil engineer,[28] or a bookkeeper;[29] but have been held not to extend to one who merely has charge of the company's office and of the receipts and who keeps in a book the time of the workmen as handed to him.[30] The term "laborer" does not extend to contractors or subcontractors who supply laborers and teams,[31] even though they personally expend labor with that of the laborers employed by them.[32] A teamster is a laborer as far as his own personal services are concerned,[33] but has been held not to be such with respect to the use of his team.[34] He may, however, have a lien for his wages for himself and the team which he uses, where the statute provides that laborers who have performed labor or work with teams, to whom wages are due for such work or for the work of the team employed, shall have a lien.[35] Where the statute permits a lien in favor of claimant only for his own personal services and that of his teams and tools, a claimant must not intermingle with his claims for labor, tools, and teams furnished by other persons.[36]

f. Assignees or Purchasers of Claims

Some authorities have held that liens against railroad property for labor and materials are personal and nonassignable, while other authorities have held such liens to be assignable.

Although some authorities have held that liens of the character under consideration are personal rights which are not assignable at law,[37] other authorities have held that, in the absence of a statute so providing, such liens may be assigned so as to entitle the assignees to enforce them under the statute.[38] Under some statutes it has been held that, where the lien is inchoate, and all the statutory requirements have not been complied with, it cannot be assigned so as to entitle the assignee to perfect or create the lien by complying with such requirements;[39] but after the lien has once been perfected it may be assigned so as to entitle the assignee to enforce it.[40]

Under the view that the right to a lien is personal and not assignable, one who pays off lien claims and takes up the certificate of indebtedness does not acquire a lien,[41] even though he does so at the request of the railroad company.[42] Under the view that the right to a lien is not personal and is assignable, the lien passes with an assignment of the contract or evidences of the lien indebtedness,[43] such as laborers' time checks.[44] One who, under agreement with the contractor, furnishes money for the payment of laborers' claims and to whom drafts or checks drawn by the contractor, payable to the laborers, are indorsed without recourse, does not become an equitable assignee of the laborers' lien,[45] nor is he subrogated to the laborer's lien.[46]

§ 280. —— Proceedings to Perfect Lien

a. In general
b. Filing and notice
c. Successive or amended statements

a. In General

In order to perfect a valid and enforceable lien superior to other liens on railroad property, it is necessary that the lien claimant should at least substantially comply with all the statutory requirements and take all the steps required by statute.

Although the doing of work and furnishing of materials give an inchoate lien or right to acquire a lien on railroad property, as discussed supra § 270, in order to perfect a valid and enforceable lien superior to other liens, it is necessary that the lien claimant should at least substantially comply with all the statutory requirements and take all the steps required by the statute.[47]

b. Filing and Notice

(1) In general
(2) Time
(3) Contents

(1) In General

Where the statute so requires a claimant of a lien on railroad property must file or record his claim at the place specified and within the time fixed.

In the absence of a statutory requirement, the notice of or recordation of a lien is not essential to its preservation,[48] but, where a statute so requires, it has been held that it is essential that the lien claimant shall file or record his claim,[49] at the place specified,[50] and within the time fixed, as discussed infra subdivision b (2) of this section.

Unless the statute provides otherwise, it is sufficient to file the lien in the county wherein the work is done or material furnished,[51] or in each of such counties,[52] without filing it in all of the counties traversed by the railroad, and one notice filed in each of the proper counties will cover the entire line of the road where it is included in one contract and where the work has been done on it and the materials furnished for it as a continuous line.[53]

Notice to railroad. Where the statute so requires, notice must be given to the railroad,[54] and mere knowledge by the company that a certain person is doing work and furnishing materials is not sufficient to entitle such person to a lien without other notice by or on his behalf.[55] It is generally required that the notice shall be in writing, and compliance with the statute in this respect is essential.[56] The notice should be served in compliance with statutory provisions,[57] and ordinarily personal service of the notice is required,[58] and personal service on a domestic company in such case may be made, where service cannot be had on its chief officer or managing agent, by service on any officer whose official relation to the governing body or managing agent or chief officer is such as would make it his duty to communicate such notice to such body, agent, or officer;[59] but service on a station agent,[60] or on a person who has desk room in the office of the company but who has no connection with its officers,[61] is insufficient. Where the statute provides that the notice of claim by a laborer shall be delivered to the engineer, agent, or superintendent in the employ of a corporation having charge of that part of the road on which such labor was performed, it is not required that the notice be served on the person in the immediate charge of construction.[62] Under such a statute it is sufficient that the service be made on one who has the general charge of that part of the road, whatever may be his designation.[63]

Limitation of amount of lien. Under a statute providing that a failure to file a statement shall not defeat the lien except as against purchasers and encumbrancers, a statement filed limits the amount of the lien only with respect to purchasers and encumbrancers.[64]

(2) Time

A lien for labor or materials furnished a railroad should be filed within the period prescribed by statute.

It is essential to the existence of a lien on railroad property for labor and materials that the claim or statement shall be filed within the time limited by statute,[65] and that the required notice be served on the company within the prescribed time.[66] Where the statute so requires, the claim or statement must be filed within a designated period from the time the claim falls due,[67] in which case the period runs from the time the last installment falls due;[68] or within a designated period after claimant has completed the work or furnished the materials for which the lien is claimed[69] in which case the period runs from the date on which the last item is done or furnished,[70] under each separate contract.[71] Where such period has commenced to run by reason of the completion of the work or furnishing of the materials, claimant cannot thereafter extend or revive the time by doing or furnishing small items and thereby fix a date on which the period must commence anew,[72] especially where the doing or furnishing of such items is merely colorable, and the real intention is to save or restore a right which is already imperiled or lost.[73] Where, however, even after the contract is substantially completed, claimant does further work or furnishes further materials, which is necessary for the proper performance of the contract, and this is done in good faith, the period for filing the lien will run from the period of doing such work or the furnishing of such material.[74] The running of the period is suspended by a decree of court for an account.[75]

(3) Contents

The contents of the notice, claim, or statement should comply with statutory requirements, but a substantial compliance is sufficient.

The contents of a notice, claim, or statement must substantially comply with all the requirements of the statute,[76] and all matters which the statute requires to be stated must be substantially set forth;[77] and, conversely, the notice need contain only the matters required by statute.[78] Where the statute so requires, the notice or claim must state the name of the person or company by whom claimant was employed and to whom he furnished the materials,[79] designating, if there are several persons, what portion was furnished to each severally,[80] except where there is but one contract;[81] must state interest or ownership of the company in the land over which the road is constructed;[82] and must correctly describe the property to be charged.[83] The description may be aided by the notoriety which the character of the railroad gives the work,[84] and is sufficient if it enables one familiar with the location to identify with reasonable certainty the premises intended to be described.[85] Further, when the statute so provides, the claim or notice must clearly and definitely set forth the nature and amount of the labor and materials for which the lien is claimed,[86] the agreed price or value,[87] the whole contract price for the material or labor,[88] and the dates when the work was done or materials furnished.[89] Where the work is done or the materials furnished under separate contracts, there should be separate accounts or claims filed under each contract.[90] Defects in the notice may be waived by the company, as where it makes no objection thereto in the trial court.[91] The fact that the lien claimant seeks a lien for more than he is entitled to,[92] or that he claims less than he might have claimed,[93] will not defeat his lien, but he cannot be awarded more than his claim justifies.[94] Where the statute permits the entry of judgment for the amount to which claimant may be entitled, although he may have unintentionally failed to enter the full amount of credits in his account filed to which defendant may be entitled, the omission of proper credits will not defeat the lien in the absence of proof of an intentional omission.[95]

c. Successive or Amended Statements

Under some statutes successive liens cannot be filed for the same labor and materials.

Under some statutes it is held that the filing of one claim or account, sufficient to create a lien under the statute, exhausts the contractor's power to encumber the property, and that successive liens for the same labor and materials cannot be filed, even within the statutory period,[96] and that the prescribed time within which the lien may be enforced after filing cannot be extended by the filing of an amendment or a new lien.[97] On the other hand, even under such statutes, if the first lien filed is defective another lien may be filed within the prescribed period.[98] Where the statute provides that claim shall be filed within a specified time after the last day of the last month in which any labor was performed or material was furnished, successive claims for each month's work may be filed in the case of persons who were hired and should have been paid by the month.[99]

The purpose of statutory bonds taken by a railroad company from a contractor is to relieve its property from lien liability and to substitute therefor a right of action on the bond, and such a right of action runs in favor of the persons specified in the statute.

Under some statutes provision is made for the taking of a bond by the railroad company from the person with whom a contract is made which has to be filed in each county in which any part of the work is situated, and the purpose of such bond is to relieve the railway's property from lien liability and to substitute therefor, in favor of the persons mentioned in the statute, a right of action on the bond.[1] The right to a lien exists until the bond is taken and filed as required by the statute.[2] There can be no liability on the bond by virtue of the statute until the bond has been filed.[3] In order to predicate liability on the statutory bond, it is not necessary that a lien be filed.[4] A bond, which has not been filed, will not support an action as a common-law bond in favor of the materialmen because of the want of privity.[5]

§ 282. Mortgages and Trust Deeds

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, any person or corporation may be trustee under a mortgage or trust deed executed by a railroad company.

In general, unless restricted by statute, any person may be mortgagee or trustee under a mortgage or trust deed executed by a railroad company in good faith,[6] whether or not he is beneficially interested in the security.[7] Thus a director of the mortgagor company is not, by virtue of his office, disqualified to be a mortgagee or trustee,[8] although it has been held that a mortgage executed by a railroad company to another corporation having directors in common with it is presumptively fraudulent.[9] The motive of a trustee in obtaining the qualifications necessary to serve in that capacity is not material where no improper object or purpose appears.[10] If a state officer is constituted ex officio trustee, each successor to the designated office is, during his incumbency, the person vested with power to act as trustee.[11]

Foreign corporations. Subject to the powers of corporations to act as trustees, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Trusts §§ 207, 208 also 14A C.J. p 514 note 28–p 515 note 42, a foreign corporation or trust company may act as trustee under a railroad mortgage,[12] and its right so to do is not impaired by the fact that it has not complied with statutes regulating the right of foreign companies to do business within the state.[13] A statute limiting the right to act as trustee to bona fide residents of the state and disqualifying them on removal therefrom has no application to corporations;[14] nor is such a statute violated when any one of two or more persons named as joint trustees is a resident of the state.[15]

§ 283. —— Power to Mortgage in General

A railroad company ordinarily has power to mortgage its property, subject to such statutory restrictions as may be imposed.

There is some authority for the view that, in the absence of restrictions imposed by statute or its charter, a railroad company has the same power to mortgage any of its property for a legitimate purpose as any other corporation.[16] It is the generally accepted rule, however, that while a railroad company has power to mortgage property belonging to it which is not so connected with its franchise to operate and maintain a railroad that a conveyance thereof would disable the company from performing its public duties,[17] the company cannot validly mortgage its franchise to engage in the railroad business or any corporate property essential to the operation of its road unless authority so to do has been conferred on it by charter or statute,[18] except that it may execute a mortgage for the purchase price of franchises and property lawfully purchased,[19] and that it may mortgage property on which there is an existing statutory lien in order to obtain an extension of time for the payment thereof.[20]

20. Tex.—Galveston, etc., R. Co. v.

While it would seem that such power to mortgage is usually expressly conferred on railroad companies either by their charters or by general statutes,[21] it may be implied from a grant of other powers,[22] as, for example, the power to borrow money,[23] to issue securities,[24] or to alienate, sell, or dispose of its property;[25] but, where the power to mortgage is expressly denied or limited, no general or additional power will be implied.[26] Where authority to mortgage their property is given to railroad companies by a general statute, the failure of a company to claim such power in its articles of incorporation does not deprive it thereof.[27]

Under a power to mortgage, a railroad company may execute a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage,[28] and may execute a new mortgage in renewal of an existing one.[29] Where a statute conferring the power to mortgage is applicable only to a designated railroad company or class of companies, no other company can avail itself of the provisions thereof;[30] but the fact that a company authorized to construct and maintain a railroad is also empowered to engage in another business does not render inapplicable to it a general statute authorizing railroad companies to mortgage their property.[31]

What law governs. Where a railroad company is chartered in two or more states, its power to mortgage property in one of such states is governed by the laws of that jurisdiction.[32]

Restriction on statutory power. The power of a railroad company to mortgage its property is subject to such conditions and restrictions as may be prescribed by the constitution or by statute or its charter,[33] such as limitations on the amount of indebtedness or obligations to secure which a mortgage may be made,[34] or the margin of security,[35] and compliance therewith is essential to the validity of the mortgage.[36] A power to mortgage for a specified purpose ordinarily confers no authority to mortgage for any other purpose,[37] although statutory authority to execute mortgages to secure the payment of debts contracted in constructing and completing the road has been held to authorize a mortgage not only for the completion of the road as authorized at the time of the passage of the statute, but also for the necessary acquisition of rolling stock and the building or acquisition of such branches as may thereafter be authorized;[38] but the mere fact that a company is specially authorized to execute a mortgage for a particular purpose does not take away or abridge general powers to mortgage otherwise conferred on it.[39] In authorizing a mortgage, the legislature may direct the relation which the lien of the mortgage shall bear to other liabilities of the company.[40]

Curative Statutes. A mortgage executed by a railroad company without legislative authority may be ratified or cured by a statute subsequently enacted, and thereby made as binding as if originally authorized, as far as the state and the public are concerned,[41] although interests vested prior to the enactment of such a statute cannot be changed or affected thereby.[42] Thus, a mortgage of property or franchises which at the date of its execution were not subject to be mortgaged may be effectuated

by statute,[43] since the objection to such mortgage affects the public alone and may be waived by the legislature as its representative.[44] Want of authority to execute a mortgage is sufficiently obviated or supplied by specific statutory recognition of the existence of the mortgage, as by conferring new powers on the company to enable it to pay the debt thereby secured,[45] or authorizing the issuance of new bonds in substitution for those outstanding,[46] or by a statute authorizing trustees under the mortgage to sell the mortgaged property;[47] and a statute authorizing the issuance of bonds and the execution of a mortgage to secure them renders effectual and valid a mortgage executed prior to the enactment of the statute where the bonds to be secured by it have not yet been issued,[48] since the mortgage is only an incident to the debt and has no force until the delivery of the bonds.[49]

§ 284. —— What Property May Be Mortgaged

a. In general
b. Franchises
c. After-acquired property

a. In General

Under a broad and general grant of power a railroad company can mortgage every kind of property which it owns.

A general grant to a railroad company of power to mortgage its franchises and property or its railroad ordinarily embraces, or implies as incidental thereto, the power to mortgage every kind of property owned by the company which may be necessary to the enjoyment of its franchises and the operation of its road.[50] Thus, under such provisions, a railroad company has been held to have power to execute a mortgage covering its easements or rights of way,[51] its rolling stock,[52] and unpaid subscriptions to its corporate stock.[53] Where the company is restricted by statute or its charter, however, as to the property which it may acquire and hold, a general power to mortgage extends only to property lawfully acquired and held.[54] General authority to mortgage the whole railroad or all the property of the company includes authority to mortgage any part of it,[55] except where the statute contemplates a mortgage of the road as an entirety only.[56] Property not owned by the company is not susceptible of being mortgaged by it.[57] Statutory authority to mortgage the real and personal property of a railroad has been construed as restricted, as far as personalty is concerned, to tangibles,[58] and under such a statute the power of the railroad company to mortgage certificates of stock or choses in action has been denied.[59]

Partial validity. Where property which the corporation has power to mortgage is included in a mortgage attempting to mortgage also property which the corporation has no power to mortgage, the mortgage may be good as to the former property if capable of separation.[60]

b. Franchises

While a railroad company may mortgage its secondary franchises, it may not mortgage its franchise to be a corporation.

Subject to the rule, generally obtaining, that a railroad company cannot mortgage its franchises without statutory authority, as discussed supra § 283, the secondary franchises of the company, such as the right to operate and maintain a railroad, and other rights and powers conferred on, or possessed by, the company and necessary to the enjoyment of its road, are ordinarily regarded as subject to be mortgaged with its property, as a part thereof or incidental thereto,[61] on the theory that such franchises are an integral part of the road, without which the securities would be of little value;[62] but there is also some authority to the contrary.[63]

The franchise to be a corporation, or the primary corporate franchise of a railroad company, is not subject to be mortgaged,[64] except where otherwise provided by the constitution or by statute.[65]

Where power to mortgage a franchise is lacking, a mortgage purporting to convey such franchise and the property of the company, while inoperative as to the franchise, is not for that reason invalid or ineffectual as to the property.[66]

c. After-Acquired Property

A general power to mortgage the property or road of a railroad company includes the power to mortgage property thereafter to be acquired.

While at common law a mortgage executed by a railroad company which purports to embrace after-acquired property is ordinarily regarded as inoperative as to such property, on the theory that one cannot grant or convey an effective title to anything to which he has no right,[67] in equity, at least, such a mortgage is upheld,[68] even though the property is not then in existence,[69] either on the theory that the future-acquired property is in the nature of accretions,[70] or on the theory that the company has made an executory contract which in equity will be allowed to become effective when, and as, the property comes into existence,[71] on the equitable principle that what should be done is treated as being done.[72] Subject to statutory restrictions, a general power to mortgage the property or road of a railroad company includes the power to mortgage property thereafter to be acquired.[73] Where a railroad company is expressly authorized by statute or its charter to mortgage after-acquired property, such property is subject to be mortgaged.[74] A mortgage of after-acquired railroad property has been held valid in respect of rolling stock acquired after the mortgage.[75] A mortgage of after-acquired property attaches only to such interest as the railroad company acquires, subject to any liens thereon at the time of acquisition.[76]

Income, rents, and profits. Where a railroad company has power to mortgage after-acquired property, it may execute a mortgage of income, rents, and profits thereafter to be received or to accrue;[77] but, where it has no such power as to after-acquired property, in general it cannot validly mortgage its income, rents, or profits,[78] except where given power by statute so to do.[79] In order that the operation of a railroad will not be hindered or the public inconvenienced, the power to mortgage extends only to the net income of the company, as distinguished from its gross earnings;[80] but the company, in order to make the pledge effectual, may stipulate in the mortgage that, on default of the trustee named therein, the mortgagee may take possession and operate the railroad and receive its earnings.[81]

§ 285. —— Authorization by Directors and Consent of Stockholders

a. Authorization by directors
b. Consent of stockholders

a. Authorization by Directors

The general rules relating to the necessity and sufficiency of authorization of corporate mortgages by the board of directors of the mortgagor corporation ordinarily govern in respect of mortgages by railroad companies.

The general rules relating to the necessity and sufficiency of authorization of corporate mortgages by the board of directors of the mortgagor corporation, as discussed in Corporations §§ 1174, 1175, ordinarily govern in respect of mortgages by railroad companies.[82] A statute empowering the directors of railroad companies by unanimous consent to borrow money and mortgage their property applies only to the creation of new obligations,[83] and a mere majority of the directors may validly authorize a mortgage to secure persons to whom the company is already indebted.[84] In the absence of prohibitory statute, the fact that the resolution authorizing the mortgage is adopted by the directors at a meeting held in a state other than that in which the company is incorporated will not invalidate it.[85]

Extent of authorization. A resolution of the board of directors of a railroad company directing the mortgaging of its franchises or property confers on the executive officers of the company authority reasonably incident to, or implied from, that expressly conferred;[86] but no assent to the execution of any other or different mortgage than that authorized will be implied.[87]

Evidence. The delivery by a railroad company of a mortgage signed by its president and secretary and bearing its corporate seal is prima facie evidence that its execution was duly authorized,[88] as is the inclusion in the mortgage of a copy of the resolution of the board of directors authorizing it,[89] or a subsequent admission by the company of the execution of the mortgage;[90] but an erroneous recital in a mortgage of the resolution authorizing it does not prevent the company from showing the extent of the authorization.[91]

Ratification. A mortgage not validly authorized in advance of its execution may be ratified by the subsequent act of the board of directors or the stockholders.[92] Thus, recognition of the existence of an outstanding mortgage in a resolution authorizing the execution of a subsequent mortgage constitutes a ratification equivalent to a prior authorization;[93] and a resolution of the board of directors authorizing a conveyance of the company's property to another railroad company on condition that it assume certain designated mortgages amounts to a ratification of such mortgages so as to cure any defect arising from the fact that the meeting at which their execution was directed was not duly called and held.[94] Similarly, a failure to disaffirm an unauthorized mortgage coupled with the receipt and retention of money or other benefits received thereunder, renders the mortgage valid, although the directors' meeting at which its execution was authorized was not properly held,[95] or the mortgage executed is materially different from that of which execution was directed;[96] and the acceptance by the stockholders of a report of the directors showing execution of a mortgage amounts to a ratification.[97]

On the other hand, a mortgage which is void for fraud or illegality cannot by ratification be given any effectiveness.[98] While ratification may effectuate terms of a mortgage more extensive than those originally authorized,[99] it is inoperative as to provisions not customary in railroad mortgages or expressly or impliedly authorized to be included, and of which the directors or stockholders have no actual knowledge at the time of ratification.[1]

b. Consent of Stockholders

Where the charter or a statute confers the management and control of a railroad company on its officers and directors, it is not necessary to secure the consent of stockholders to a mortgage of its property unless a statute so requires.

Where the charter of a railroad company or a statute confers the general power of management and control of the company on its president and board of directors, the consent of the stockholders to the mortgage of its franchises or property is unnecessary in the absence of any provision expressly requiring it.[2] A provision in a statute authorizing the execution of mortgages for particular purposes which requires the consent of stockholders is not applicable to mortgages executed for other purposes,[3] and a statute requiring such consent to mortgages executed by companies organized under its provisions has no application to companies already in existence.[4] It has also been held that such a requirement does not apply to a mortgage executed not to create a new lien, but merely to extend an existing one.[5] Statutes requiring such consent are primarily for the benefit of the stockholders,[6] and the want of such consent cannot be asserted, to defeat a mortgage, by creditors of the company.[7]

Directors owning prescribed majority of stock. The authorization of a mortgage by directors owning the prescribed majority of the stock of the company is, in legal effect, a concurrence of the stockholders and a substantial compliance with a statute requiring their consent.[8]

§ 286. —— Form, Requisites, and Validity

a. In general
b. Consideration
c. Execution and delivery
d. Recording and registration

g. Who may question validity

a. In General

In the absence of statutory restriction, no particular form of instrument is necessary to constitute a mortgage of railroad property, and the mortgage may be in the form of a deed of trust.

In the absence of statutory restriction, no particular form of instrument is necessary to constitute a mortgage of franchises or property of a railroad company, and the real intention of the parties, and not the form of the instrument or the name by which it is called, is the essential factor.[9] So, a deed of trust conveying any such franchises or property, when executed as security for the payment of a debt or obligation, constitutes a mortgage,[10] and has been said to be the usual form thereof.[11] Moreover, where intended as such, an agreement of pledge,[12] or lease,[13] or conditional sale,[14] or a bill of sale,[15] will also constitute a mortgage of the property described therein.

Defective or incomplete instrument. An instrument executed by a railroad company may be treated as a mortgage as against the company and those with knowledge of the nature of the transaction where the design of the parties is manifest, although it is defective or incomplete, as in failing to state the amount of the indebtedness secured,[16] or to fix any time for payment or redemption.[17]

erty,[19] and is such that performance of its terms may be specifically enforced;[20] but, where the giving of the security depends on the discretionary act of a third person, the agreement is not effectual as a mortgage.[21]

Statutory mortgages. Under a statute authorizing the exchange of state bonds for mortgage bonds of a railroad company, railroad bonds when delivered to the state constitute a statutory mortgage on the property of the company without the formal execution of a mortgage,[22] and, similarly, a statutory mortgage comes into existence as soon as the state and a railroad company have assented to a loan provided for by statute in the manner thereby prescribed,[23] since any requirement of further acts on the part of the company constitutes only a condition subsequent which does not postpone the existence of the mortgage.[24] On the other hand, where a statute providing for the making of a loan by the state requires the formal execution of the mortgage by the borrowing company, the mere lending of money to the company will not create a mortgage on its property;[25] and a provision of the charter of a railroad company authorizing the issuance of bonds which shall be binding on the corporate property does not dispense with the execution of a mortgage so as to make such bonds when issued a lien on the property.[26]

b. Consideration

The general rules control with respect to the necessity and sufficiency of the consideration to support a railroad mortgage

The rules relating to the necessity and sufficiency of consideration for mortgages generally, as discussed in Mortgages §§ 87–98, are applicable to mortgages executed by railroad companies.[27] A mortgage given to secure bonds previously issued is supported by a consideration;[28] and the sale of the bonds secured at a discount does not make the mortgage invalid for want of consideration.[29] In view of the rule that there can be no mortgage unless there is a debt to be secured thereby, as discussed in Mortgages § 87, a mortgage made to secure bonds which are invalid is itself invalid and unenforceable.[30] A mortgage executed to secure the purchase price of property granted to the company at the request of another company to which the grantor was obligated to transfer such property is supported by a sufficient consideration, since the grant is not an act which the grantor was already legally bound to do.[31]

c. Execution and Delivery

According to some, but not other, authority a mortgage by a railroad company of its rolling stock and other movable property must comply with general statutes relating to the execution of chattel mortgages. The due execution and recording of a mortgage, and acts by the company recognizing its valid existence, constitute sufficient evidence of its delivery.

According to some authorities, a mortgage by a railroad company of its rolling stock and other movable property must comply with general statutes relating to the execution of chattel mortgages;[32] but there is also authority, to the contrary, that such statutes are inapplicable to ordinary railroad mortgages.[33]

Execution outside state of incorporation. In the absence of prohibitory statute, a railroad mortgage may validly be executed and acknowledged in a state other than that in which the company was incorporated.[34]

Defective execution. An instrument by way of mortgage of franchises or property of a railroad company which is defectively executed nevertheless constitutes, when duly recorded, at least a valid equitable claim superior to the rights of an attaching creditor;[35] and a recital in a subsequent mortgage of the existence, as a valid lien, of a mortgage which was defectively executed establishes the priority of such earlier conveyances over claims under the later one.[36] After a railroad company has received the benefit of a mortgage, it cannot be heard to say that the instrument is invalid because of defective execution.[37]

Delivery. The due execution and recording of a mortgage, and acts by the company recognizing its valid existence, constitute sufficient evidence of its delivery.[38]

d. Recording and Registration

In the absence of statutes particularly applicable to railroad mortgages, the general statutory provisions relative to filing and recording of mortgages govern.

In the absence of statutes particularly applicable to railroad mortgages, general statutory provisions relating to the necessity and sufficiency of filing and recording real estate mortgages govern mortgages of the real property of a railroad company,[39] and those applicable to chattel mortgages control mortgages confined to personal property of the company,[40] except that no record of a statutory mortgage is necessary, since the statute creating it gives constructive notice of its existence and contents,[41] and that a statute requiring mortgages to be filed or recorded does not apply to a mortgage extending or continuing an existing statutory lien.[42] Generally speaking, the recordation or registration of a mortgage is not necessary to its validity as between the parties,[43] or as to others having notice of its existence,[44] unless a statute provides that an unrecorded mortgage shall be invalid as to creditors, in which case it will be held invalid as to a creditor, even though he had actual knowledge thereof.[45] Unless duly filed or recorded, a railroad mortgage is ordinarily ineffectual as against third persons without notice.[46] An instrument which is not only a chattel mortgage but also a contract for the sale of railroad equipment need not be recorded as a chattel mortgage if it is recorded as provided for by a special statute dealing with contracts of its type.[47]

Mortgages of both realty and personalty. Except where otherwise provided by statutes governing railroad mortgages, the recordation, as a real estate mortgage, of a mortgage covering both real and personal property of a railroad company is ordinarily held to be insufficient as to the personalty included if the requirements of the general statutes relating to the registration or recordation of chattel mortgages have not been complied with;[48] but a statute providing that mortgages embracing both real and personal property, when duly recorded as mortgages of real property, need not be recorded as chattel mortgages puts the status of the mortgage lien on the personalty on virtually the same basis and makes it subject to virtually the same rules as a mortgage of realty.[49] Where both a general chattel mortgage act and a special act with respect to railroad mortgages coexist, the fact that the latter merely sets out a method of record without providing any penalties for noncompliance will not cause the penalties prescribed in the chattel mortgage statute to apply to failure to record a railroad mortgage as directed,[50] and only such penalties and effect will follow as would result from a failure to record in the absence of statute.[51] A special statute relating to the recordation or registration of railroad mortgages is not repealed by implication by the mere enactment of a general chattel mortgage statute,[52] or by amendment or alteration of an existing general statute.[53]

Place. A statute requiring chattel mortgages to be filed in the town where the mortgagor resides, if a resident of the state, and if not a resident, where the property mortgaged is situate at the time of the execution of the mortgage, is fully satisfied by filing

Operation of statute
A statute withdrawing such combination mortgages from the operation of the Chattel Mortgage Act does not act retrospectively to affect private rights acquired before its passage.—Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co., 29 N.J.Eq. 311—51 C.J. p. 834 note 11.

a railroad mortgage in every town through which the railroad runs.[54]

Record or registration as notice. The record or registration in proper manner of a mortgage executed by a railroad company gives notice to all the world of the lien of the mortgage,[55] effective from the time of recordation or registration.[56] Recording a mortgage in full, as distinguished from mere registry, gives constructive notice of its entire contents.[57]

What law governs. The necessity and sufficiency of recordation or registration of a mortgage of personal property of a railroad company are governed by the law of the state where the property is situate,[58] except that a statute giving validity to mortgages only after they are filed for record does not apply to mortgages executed out of the state on property situate outside of the state at the time the mortgage was executed,[59] even though the mortgaged property is subsequently brought within the state for a temporary purpose.[60]

e. Transfer of Possession of Personalty

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, where the parties act in good faith, a mortgage of personal property necessary to carry on the business of the railroad company is valid as against creditors without a transfer of possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee. A failure to record a mortgage of railroad personalty may be cured by a transfer of possession of the property to the mortgagee.

The general rule, in the absence of recording acts, is that retention by a railroad company of possession of mortgaged personal property and failure to transfer it to the mortgagee render the mortgage prima facie fraudulent as to creditors;[61] but, where the parties act in good faith, it does not invalidate the mortgage,[62] and so, unless otherwise provided by statute, a mortgage of personal property necessary to carry on the business of the company is valid as against creditors without a transfer of possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee.[63] Similarly, a provision in a mortgage of income permitting the company to use as much of the income as necessary for operating and maintaining the road does not invalidate the mortgage.[64] Where a chattel mortgage is filed or recorded, under a statute providing therefor, transfer of possession by the company to the mortgagee has been held unnecessary.[65] Statutory provisions authorizing a railroad company to mortgage cars, engines, and other personal property without delivery of possession, provided the mortgage is recorded, have been construed as applicable only to personal property such as rolling stock,[66] and not to stocks and bonds.[67] Transfer of possession to a receiver appointed to administer the affairs of the company for the benefit of its creditors is tantamount to a transfer to the mortgagee.[68]

In the absence of statute rendering unrecorded chattel mortgages void as to creditors, any invalidity or ineffectiveness, as to third persons, of a mortgage of personal property of a railroad company is cured by a transfer of possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee,[69] or his agent,[70] at any time before a levy or seizure has been made in behalf of one as to whom the mortgage was invalid or ineffectual, unless a transfer of possession immediately on the execution of the mortgage is required by statute, in which case a transfer at any later time is ineffectual.[71] Subject to such exception, possession taken by a purchaser at a foreclosure sale under the mortgage is effectual against creditors in whose favor no levy or seizure has then been made.[72]

f. Fraud

A mortgage of railroad property executed and accepted as part of a fraudulent scheme is wholly void, even in the hands of bona fide holders of obligations secured by it.

A mortgage executed and accepted as part of a fraudulent scheme is wholly void,[73] even in the hands of bona fide holders of obligations secured by it;[74] but one who has been a party to the fraud cannot assert rights against the company in opposition to claims under such a mortgage advanced by good faith holders.[75] Further, it has been held that the principle that, where a part of the consideration for a mortgage is fictitious and fraudulent, the whole instrument is void as against third persons does not, as applied to a mortgage intended to secure advances made by the real owners of the mortgagor corporation, extend to the prejudice of innocent holders of the mortgage notes.[76]

g. Who May Question Validity

The invalidity of a mortgage executed by a railroad company may be asserted only by the state where it arises out of the violation of a restriction imposed for the benefit of the public. A railroad company is ordinarily estopped to deny the validity of a mortgage of which it has received and retained the benefit.

The invalidity of a mortgage executed by a railroad company may be asserted only by the state where it arises out of the violation of a restriction imposed for the benefit of the public;[77] and a general creditor whose claims arose subsequent to the execution of a mortgage ordinarily may not object to it as an unlawful preference.[78] A statute declaring railroad mortgages invalid as against creditors claiming for work done or materials furnished will not invalidate a mortgage as to subcontractors who failed to file notice of their claims with the company, as they were authorized by statute to do, before payment in full to the principal contractor.[79]

Estoppel. A railroad company, notwithstanding its quasi-public character, is ordinarily estopped to deny the validity of a mortgage of which it has received and retained the benefit, or to deny its liability thereunder, on any ground,[80] as, for example, that the indebtedness secured was in excess of that permitted by statute to be incurred,[81] or that the consent of stockholders, as required by a statute, was not had,[82] or that the company is only a corporation de facto and not de jure;[83] and persons standing in the place of the mortgagor company or deriving title through it are similarly estopped where it would be.[84]

d. What law governs

a. General Principles

The construction of mortgages of railroad property is governed largely by the intention of the parties as expressed by them in the instrument.

As in the case of mortgages executed by other corporations, discussed in Corporations §§ 1187-1189, the construction of railroad mortgages is governed largely by the intention of the parties,[85] as expressed by them in the instrument.[86] Words must be taken in their natural import, in the absence of restrictive terms,[87] and the language of a mortgage should be interpreted as it would be by a plain and careful mind,[88] and in the light of the statutory or charter provisions by which it was authorized.[89] The mortgage should be construed with other instruments executed at the same time,[90] and should be read as a whole,[91] and provisions cannot be detached from their context and construed independently.[92] A mortgage should be so construed, if possible, that every part thereof will be made operative;[93] a court will not treat as useless any of the words or phrases of the instrument to which a natural meaning can be given,[94] and, if any part of the description is inoperative to convey the property which it attempts to mortgage, the court will nevertheless enforce the mortgage on included property of other descriptions in nature separable from that as to which the mortgage is inoperative.[95] A railroad mortgage speaks as of the time of its execution.[96] Any construction of the mortgage necessary to allow the railroad system to be kept up to date will be made where the language used is capable of such a construction and there is nothing expressly to the contrary.[97]

Provisions defining rights after default. Provisions in a railroad mortgage in the form of a trust deed limiting or defining the rights, after default, of the trustee or the bondholders are to be construed strictly,[98] but according to the fair and reasonable meaning of the language used,[99] taking into consideration the nature of the provision and the character of its object.[1]

Subordination of lien. The language of a railroad mortgage will not be so construed as to subordinate its lien to a subsequent mortgage if susceptible of a different and equally tenable construction.[2]

b. Ambiguities and Repugnancies

Where the language of a railroad mortgage is ambiguous, the court may look to extraneous matters to resolve the ambiguity. In the event of repugnancy between two clauses in the instrument, it has been held that the one first appearing will control.

If the language of a railroad mortgage is ambiguous, the court may look to the situation of the parties at or near the time of execution and the nature and object of their transaction to assist in its construction.[3] Likewise, the interpretation of an ambiguous expression in the mortgage may be controlled by the interpretation which the parties in their course of dealing under it have ratified and adopted;[4] but, where the meaning of a provision is clear, an erroneous construction by them will not control its effect.[5] Where one construction would make the contract illegal and invalid and another legal and valid, preference will be given if possible to the construction which makes it legal.[6] An ambiguity in the terms of a mortgage is ordinarily to be construed against the company,[7] and in favor of the bondholders,[8] although it has been held that provisions with respect to entry or sale by the trustee on default are to be construed in favor of the company in case of doubt.[9]

It has been held that, where two clauses in a railroad mortgage are repugnant and cannot stand together, the one first appearing in the instrument will stand and the later one will be rejected.[10]

c. Construction of Mortgage and Bonds Together

A railroad mortgage and the bonds secured thereby should be construed together.

10. N.Y.—Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Central Trust Co., 141 N.Y.S. 66, 156 App.Div. 132.

A mortgage of a railroad is to be construed in connection with bonds secured by it,[11] and, where by reference in the bonds and coupons the mortgage is incorporated with them, the provisions of all the instruments must be examined together to discover the intent and meaning of the contract.[12] Where the terms of the bonds and those of the mortgage are inconsistent, the terms of the bonds will control.[13] There is nothing repugnant or conflicting in the terms of bonds and of a mortgage where the mortgage secures the bonds according to their terms and also by providing additional funds out of which they may be paid.[14]

d. What Law Governs

The construction of a railroad mortgage is ordinarily governed by the law of the state where it was executed and where the property is situated.

The construction of a railroad mortgage is ordinarily governed by the law of the state wherein it was executed and where the property conveyed by it is situate,[15] even though interest coupons attached to the bonds secured are by their terms payable in another state.[16] Where the place of execution does not appear, the court is not bound by principles of comity to follow the construction given to similar mortgages by the courts of one of several states wherein the mortgaged property is situate,[17] but may construe the instrument according to the common law.[18]

a. In general
b. Real or personal property
c. Appurtenances
d. Franchises
e. Earnings, income, and other funds
f. After-acquired property

a. In General

The property included in a mortgage of railroad property is determined by construing the instrument in accordance with the intention of the parties as disclosed by the language used therein.

The general rule that a mortgage executed by a railroad company is to be construed in accordance with the intention of the parties as expressed therein, as discussed supra § 287 a, has been applied in determining what property is included in the mortgage;[19] and the mortgage must be read as a whole.[20] Accordingly, a description in general terms of the property to be conveyed by a railroad mortgage is sufficient, provided the designation is such that the property intended to be conveyed can be identified or ascertained;[21] and for this purpose resort may

(2) But system mortgages, including property for use on, or in connection with, or for the purpose of lines of railroad, did not cover railroad's coal lands.—Liberty Nat. Bank & Trust Co. of Savannah v. Bankers Trust Co., C.C.A.Ga., 150 F.2d 453.

Substitution

The provision of a railroad mortgage for substitution of other realty on sale of mortgaged parcels when no default existed in mortgage bonds could not be invoked many years after tracks of mortgaged railroad were relocated and after default in mortgage bonds, especially where original location could not be sold without improvements constructed after relocation of tracks.—In re New York, N. Property owned by subsidiary

A mortgage on railway lines given by parent corporation conveyed by way of mortgage only as much of railway lines as was actually owned by parent corporation, but by hypothecating as collateral the mortgages of subsidiary corporations, all of which mortgages were owned by parent corporation, bondholders of parent corporation were secured pro tanto by liens covering the other parts of railway lines owned by subsidiary corporations.—Carolina, C. & O Ry. of South Carolina v. be had to oral evidence.[22] Indeed, the description in a mortgage executed by a railroad company covering all its personal property is not required to be as definite and certain as in an ordinary chattel mortgage, by reason of the peculiar nature of the transaction.[23]

General terms in a description are controlled and limited by a subsequent specification or designation of property to be included,[24] and in the construction of the mortgage are not to be detached from those of an explanatory character which immediately follow.[25] Broadly speaking, if the object is to convey a limited interest, general words do not operate to enlarge that interest, but, if the object is to convey a general interest, they operate to include everything that falls within the general words used.[26] On the other hand, while the force of general terms is not to be frittered away by an attempt at more particular description,[27] and a general grant of property "inclusive of" particular articles or items cannot be treated as limited or restricted by such specification,[28] all that can be embraced by the more general terms will not be treated as conveyed unless the intention so to do is apparent.[29] Where a specific enumeration of particular articles of property is followed by general terms, the latter terms are ordinarily construed to refer only to articles of the same nature and kind as those specifically named,[30] and will not be treated as including more or other property than that conveyed by the preceding terms;[31] but this rule yields to the intention to be gathered from the context and general scope of the instrument.[32] A broad general grant among a number of specifically described items is properly limited in effect to an explanation of the other words of the series which are in immediate connection with it.[33]

Exclusion by implication. The doctrine that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another or others is applicable to railroad mortgages,[34] particularly since it may fairly be assumed that those who draft a railroad mortgage are competent for the purpose and skilled in that branch of the law,[35] so that their omissions cannot be taken to be inadvertent.[36] However, the doctrine is limited by the rule that the omission to specify a thing along with other things which are enumerated does not exclude it if any of the enumerated things could be of no use without it,[37] except where the mortgage speaks clearly for itself as to what is and is not to be included.[38]

Reference to other instruments. A railroad mortgage expressly referring to another instrument for a description of the property conveyed may by such reference sufficiently identify the security, provided the reference is clear;[39] but it will not do so if the instrument thus referred to is not in existence at the time of the execution of the mortgage.[40] A mortgage describing the property conveyed as all that described or referred to in a certain other mortgage, which by its terms covered after-acquired property, conveys property acquired since the execution of such other mortgage.[41]

Nature of interest or title. Where the description is otherwise sufficient, a railroad mortgage passes the equitable interest of the company in property the title of which the company could compel to be conveyed to it,[42] such as lands bought by the company or with its funds but to which title was taken in another's name,[43] or lands occupied by the company under an executory agreement to purchase.[44] On the other hand, an interest which has never become a consummated right in law or equity does not pass by such a mortgage.[45]

Mortgage of "railroad" The extent of the property conveyed by a mortgage of a railroad company's "road" or "railroad" is to be determined largely in the light of the character, condition, and circumstances of the subject matter.[46] In general, no more is included by the term than would be conveyed under a description of the roadway and other lands of the company by metes and bounds, with the appurtenances;[47] and a mortgage of a railroad eo nomine will not be treated as embracing all of the property of the company of every kind merely because it was acquired for railroad purposes.[48] Such a mortgage does not include a subsequent extension of its line which at the time of execution of the mortgage the company was not authorized to make,[49] or any property which it was not then authorized to acquire,[50] but its force or lien is not affected by alterations in plan or deviations in location made without any abandonment of the original project but in pursuance thereof,[51] or construction beyond one of the termini proposed at the time of execution of the mortgage.[52] A mortgage conveying all the property belonging or appertaining to the railroad of the mortgagor company does not include property belonging to the company but not appertaining to its road;[53] but a mortgage of the railroad and property of the company passes not only the road and its appurtenances but also other property and lands not necessary to the road.[54]

b. Real or Personal Property

(1) In general

(2) Particular descriptions of real property

(3) Particular descriptions applicable to personal property

(1) In General

Generally a mortgage of realty includes the railroad itself and articles designed to be attached to the ground or already firmly annexed thereto, while a mortgage of personalty includes articles which may be used for other than railroad purposes or carried away without showing that they were designed for railroad use.

In determining what property passes under a mortgage executed by a railroad company as real estate and what as personal property, it is a general rule that a mortgage of realty includes the railroad itself, both ground and superstructure[55] and depot grounds,[56] buildings,[57] and turntables,[58] as well as rails, ties, spikes, and other articles designed to be attached to the ground[59] or already firmly annexed thereto;[60] but articles which may be used for other than railroad purposes or carried away without showing that they were designed for railroad use are personalty[61] and so a mortgage of personal property will include such things as fuel,[62] oil,[63] office furniture,[64] platform scales,[65] planing mills,[66] loose tools and implements,[67] and all other articles not constituting a part of the roadbed or firmly fixed to the land or to some building which is itself a fixture,[68] including such articles as are usually denominated "chattels," although affixed by a screw or the like to some building where they are removable without detriment to the building.[69] It has been held that rails, ties, spikes, and other materials on hand designed to be attached to the road in running or repairing it are real property, passing under a real estate mortgage,[70] but there is also authority for the contrary view that they are personal property and do not pass under a mortgage of the company's realty.[71]

Rolling stock of a railroad company is treated by some authorities as real property, so as to be included in a mortgage thereof,[72] at least if it is located on the company's own property or road;[73] but according to other authorities such property must be included as personal property if it is to pass by the mortgage.[74]

(2) Particular Descriptions of Real Property

Various descriptions of real property mortgaged by railroad companies have been judicially construed as to the property included.

A mortgage of lands and property used or to be used for a railroad or for railroad purposes does not include town lots on which the railroad is not located and which have never been appropriated to railroad purposes,[75] or those designed as the location for a factory for building railroad cars,[76] or lands which the company plans to sell its employees for building purposes,[77] although such parcels are temporarily used for railroad purposes,[78] or dwellings provided for company employees and rented to them by the company;[79] but such a description does cover lands used to store fuel for the railroad.[80] Tracts of land which are not immediately useful or necessary for railroad purposes but which are adapted to, and will probably become necessary for, the future use of the company pass under such a mortgage,[81] even though intended for railroad use only in certain contingencies which have not occurred,[82] and the fact that such use or probability of use subsequently came to an end does not withdraw the land from the operation of the mortgage;[83] but any portions of such tracts not used or useful immediately or in prospect and which can be separated from the used or useful portions are not included in the mortgage.[84]

Necessity and convenience for use and operation. A mortgage of real estate necessary and convenient for the use and operation of a railroad does not cover a dwelling house ordinarily rented as a residence to the officers and employees of the company,[85] although at one time used temporarily for company offices,[86] since the subsequent abandonment is evidence that it was not necessary or convenient for the operation of the road,[87] nor does such a mortgage include land bought in order to obtain a right of way more cheaply and designed to be held temporarily and sold at a profit,[88] or land granted to aid in the construction of the road,[89] or land which the parties have stipulated was not used or necessary to be retained for future use by the railroad for operating its railroads or branches.[90] While it is for the jury to determine whether land was purchased for use in the operation of the road,[91] the judgment of officers of the railroad company as to the quantity necessary for railroad purposes is ordinarily conclusive.[92]

A mortgage of the entire line of railroad from one terminus to another includes the whole of the road, although part of it was unbuilt when the mortgage was executed.[93]

Property connected with a railroad, as so described in a mortgage, includes depots and premises acquired and used for station purposes.[94]

A mortgage of lands acquired for the purposes of the road includes only those acquired for the road and necessary and convenient for the construction and operation thereof,[95] and those purchased to be sold at a profit, although the profit may be expended on the construction of the road, are not embraced in the mortgage.[96]

A mortgage of the company's rights of way does not include its rights as covenantee in personal covenants contained in a grant of a right of way.[97]

A mortgage on the main line of a railroad does not cover real estate having an actual situs in another state, across the state boundary from the terminal point of the main railroad line.[98]

A mortgage of depots includes not only places provided for the convenience of passengers awaiting the arrival or departure of trains,[99] but also buildings used for the receipt and storage of freight until it is forwarded or delivered.[1]

(3) Particular Descriptions Applicable to Personal Property

Particular descriptions of the property covered by a mortgage executed by a railroad company have been held applicable to the personal property of the company, including choses in action and chattels real.

A mortgage of all the property necessary to the operation of the mortgagor company's railroad includes such personal property of the company as it has deemed best to acquire for the use of its franchises most profitable to itself and most beneficial to the public,[2] although not indispensably required for the operation of the road.[3] A mortgage in general terms of the "property of the company" is sufficient to include such worn-out or broken personal property as the proper management of the road requires to be repaired or recast by the company or others for it or exchanged for new articles,[4] and also includes a tugboat required in the conduct of the company's business of hauling and delivering coal to ships;[5] but boats and wharves not connected with a railroad or intended for its use and acquired only in order to destroy competition do not pass under a mortgage of railroad property owned and used or useful in the operation of the road or in connection therewith.[6] Rails severed from the realty and unfit for further use pass under a mortgage conveying among other things "rails, material, etc.;"[7] and a mortgage of "materials used" on the road passes fuel supplies.[8] A mortgage of the furniture and equipment of a railroad does not convey machinery used in the treatment and preservation of ties.[9]

Choses in action and chattels real. A mortgage of all rights and interests of a railroad company is broad enough to include choses in action.[10] A mortgage expressly including the rights and interests acquired under a certain contract covers traffic rights under such contract.[11] It has been held that unpaid subscriptions to the stock of a railroad company are included in a mortgage covering the company's "evidence of debt,"[12] but not in a mortgage of all its "rights . . . claims and demands whatsoever."[13] The rights of the company as lessee of a connecting road are included in a mortgage of all property and rights connected with, or appurtenant to, its road,[14] but its rights as lessee of a hotel not used in connection with the operation of the road are not included.[15]

Designation of mortgagor company. Where a mortgage of the rolling stock of a certain division of a railroad contains a covenant on the part of the mortgagor railroad company to designate in a prescribed mode, as belonging to that division, a certain proportion of the whole rolling stock owned by the company, the mortgage covers only such rolling stock as is thereafter designated as belonging to the division named,[16] although the whole amount covenanted for is not so designated.[17] The lien of such mortgage on the rolling stock which has been so designated is not lost, as between the parties or as to others having notice of the existence of the mortgage, by subsequent obliteration of the designating marks where such rolling stock is otherwise traceable.[18]

c. Appurtenances

Within a mortgage of a railroad and its appurtenances, those things only are appurtenances which are incidents to the railroad and are reasonably necessarily connected with its use and enjoyment, as distinguished from things merely convenient thereto.

Within a mortgage of a railroad and its appurtenances or property appertaining to it, those things only are appurtenances which are incidents to the railroad and are necessarily connected with its use and enjoyment,[19] as distinguished from things merely convenient thereto.[20] They need not, however, be necessary in the strictest sense,[21] or indispensable,[22] since all that is required is that they be reasonably necessary for the present operations of the road and held for that purpose.[23] So, the fact that parts of the property of the company could be detached and sold without causing any immediate inconvenience to the railroad or the company does not show that such parts do not appertain to the road;[24] and realty owned and used for roadway purposes at the time of the execution of the mortgage is subject to the lien notwithstanding the tracks were subsequently relocated on other land.[25] While the phrases "connected with" and "appurtenant to" in a railway mortgage are not necessarily synonymous,[26] property not connected with what is ordinarily termed the "plant" or not forming a part of the organic structure of the road is not treated as appurtenant to it;[27] and the mere fact that property is used in a manner beneficial to the income of the road and so as to facilitate traffic on it does not make it appurtenant to the railroad.[28] Nevertheless, the mortgage may manifest an intent that realty physically unconnected with the rails should be deemed appertaining or belonging to the line of railroad;[29] and a mortgage of all land appertaining or belonging to the line of the railroad may include a parcel which was leased to another railroad and which was used for general system purposes by the lessee.[30]

The term "appurtenances" cannot fairly be construed as including equipment[31] or rolling stock,[32] but relates rather to things akin to the line of railroad, such as switchyards, spur tracks, and the like.[33] Although strictly speaking land cannot be appurtenant to other land of the company,[34] it can pass under a mortgage as appurtenant to a railroad,[35] and the true test to ascertain whether any particular parcel of land passes as an appurtenance has been said to be whether it is so connected with, and used by, the company for the railroad that it could have been taken compulsorily therefor from a private owner,[36] although it has also been held to be within the province of the jury to determine whether land has been so appropriated as to become appurtenant to the road.[37] A mortgage on a railroad between two cities named as termini, with property appertaining to it, creates a lien on its terminal facilities as appurtenances, and is not limited to so much of the road as is found between the city limits of those places.[38] A mortgage on the road and its appurtenances is less inclusive than a mortgage on the road and property of the company.[39]

d. Franchises

A mortgage of the road or property of a railroad company includes the secondary franchises of the company, but not ordinarily the primary franchise to be a corporation or an exemption from taxation, a mortgage of the secondary franchises conveys nothing tangible.

A mortgage of the road or property of a railroad company includes the secondary franchises of the company, as far as necessary to make the other property and effects conveyed by the mortgage productive and profitable;[40] but a mortgage of such franchises conveys nothing tangible,[41] nor does it extend the effect or operation of other terms employed to designate the tangible property intended to be mortgaged,[42] and the mere fact that property is convenient to the exercise of the company's privileges does not cause it to pass under a mortgage of the franchises.[43]

The primary franchise to be a corporation is not ordinarily regarded as included in a mortgage of the "franchises" of a railroad company,[44] especially since it is not, strictly speaking, a franchise of the company, but rather a franchise of the corporators and stockholders of the company;[45] but a mortgage of all its franchises executed by a railroad company under a statute providing that a purchaser at foreclosure sale might continue to operate the railroad under the charter of the mortgagor company passes the corporate franchise of the company.[46]

Exemption from taxation conferred on a railroad company, being a personal privilege, is not covered by a mortgage of the company's franchises.[47]

e. Earnings, Income, and Other Funds

Funds in the hands of a railroad company at the time of the execution of a mortgage of all of its property are embraced therein, but, in the absence of express agreement to the contrary, the subsequent earnings and income of the company do not pass under a mortgage of its property while the company retains possession thereof.

Funds in the hands of a railroad company at the time of the execution of a mortgage of all its property are embraced therein.[48] Rentals falling due under a lease executed by the mortgagor may be assigned in trust to the trustee under the mortgage to the extent necessary to pay interest on the mortgage bonds,[49] and such rentals are not subject to attachment and levy as funds of the mortgagor;[50] but, in the absence of express agreement to the contrary, the subsequent earnings and income of a railroad company do not pass under a mortgage of its property while the company retains possession thereof,[51] but remain the property of the company and subject to its control until the mortgagee or trustee takes possession of the property, or something equivalent is done.[52] When income is mortgaged, the lien of the mortgage extends only to the net income of the company.[53] A mortgage of the income,

f. After-Acquired Property

(1) In general
(2) Intention to convey
(3) Description and nature in general
(4) Legal or equitable interests
(5) Lines subsequently constructed or acquired
(6) Rolling stock, track, rails, and other personal property
(7) Earnings, income, and other funds

(1) In General

Where the terms of the mortgage show an intention to embrace after-acquired property, the mortgage will attach as an equitable lien on property embraced in the terms of the mortgage as soon as it is acquired or comes into existence, but such a clause does not give a present lien on nonexistent property, and generally it extends only to property subsequently acquired by the mortgagor company.

It is well settled that, where the terms of the mortgage show an intention to embrace after-acquired property, the mortgage will attach as an equitable lien on all after-acquired property, embraced in the terms of the mortgage, as soon as it is acquired or comes into existence,[55] whether the property is acquired by the company under its old name or under its new name after reorganization.[56] Such a clause does not give a present lien on nonexistent property, but merely creates an obligation on the mortgagor to subject to the lien of the mortgage all after-acquired property of the character described in the clause.[57] Such a mortgage does not cover property which the railroad company had no power to acquire or hold when the mortgage was executed, and the acquisition of which was not in contemplation at that time.[58]

As a general rule an after-acquired property clause extends only to property subsequently acquired by the mortgagor company;[59] hence, it does not cover property acquired by a consolidated company into which the mortgagor company has been merged[60] as against a mortgagee of the consolidated company.[61] However, this is a matter of contract and intention,[62] so, although the word "successors" does not appear in the after-acquired property clause, it has been held that it may apply to property acquired by a company growing out of a consolidation by the mortgagor with other companies under a statute providing for the enforcement of debts and obligations of the old companies against the new.[63] On the other hand, the term "successors" has been held to apply to corporate successors only and not to a vendee who takes title by ordinary purchase.[64]

Property acquired after disposal of bonds. Where the mortgage provides that it shall not attach to property acquired after the bonds secured have been sold or disposed of, a destruction or cancellation of unissued bonds does not constitute a sale or disposal of them.[65]

(2) Intention to Convey

In order to pass after-acquired property the intention of the parties must clearly appear from the face of the mortgage, and doubts should be resolved against an intention to cover such property.

In order to pass after-acquired property the intention of the parties must clearly appear from the face of the mortgage[66] which should contain either words of futurity[67] or language such as clearly to show an intention to cover such property,[68] and, in the absence thereof, a doubt should be resolved against such intention.[69] It has been held, however, that, where a railroad company is empowered to mortgage all of its property, privileges, and franchises, such a mortgage is a conveyance of the property and franchises as an entire thing, and that, therefore, after-acquired property essential thereto passes as an incident or accession to the franchise to acquire property.[70]

(3) Description and Nature in General

An after-acquired property clause covers all property subsequently acquired by the mortgagor which comes within the description in the mortgage, and only such property, which may be described in general terms; but in order to pass under a general description, the after-acquired property must ordinarily be such as appertains to the road and such as is necessary to the enjoyment of the franchise or the operation of the road.

An after-acquired property clause covers all property subsequently acquired by the mortgagor, which comes within the description in the mortgage,[71] although it is limited to such property.[72] While the property which it is intended to include should be described with reasonable certainty,[73] general terms may be sufficient,[74] and it has been held sufficient

51 C.J. p. 845 note 50

Clause construed with free property clause

(1) Where first general railroad mortgage specified that property then owned or subsequently acquired should be subject to mortgage lien and then dealt with free property, a proviso in free property clause that mortgagor reserved right to own and hold other property, equipment, etc., except by use of such mortgage bonds free from such lien, did not limit the after-acquired property lien to property acquired with proceeds from sale of first general mortgage bonds.—Empire Trust Co. v. U.S. Trust Co. of N.Y., C.C.A.Minn., 165 F.2d 829

(2) Such proviso was in reality a reservation since the mortgagor thereby reserved the right to own and hold free of liens property other than that covered by the mortgage lien.—Empire Trust Co. v. U.S. Trust Co. of N.Y., supra.

Equipment

(1) Where railroad equipment is purchased or paid for with first and refunding bonds as a part of a single transaction, the bondholders possess a prior lien on the equipment so acquired, and whether a single transaction exists depends on the facts and intent of the parties, the test being whether the purchase and payment or the payment and reimbursement were part of one continuous transaction and intended so to be.—In re Wisconsin Cent. Ry. Co., D.C.Minn., 68 F.Supp. 320, affirmed, C.C.A., Empire Trust Co. v. U.S. Trust Co. of N.Y., 165 F.2d 829

(2) Lien of railroad mortgage on after-acquired property attached to equipment, as cash payments were made out of general fund, regardless of augmentation of general fund through sale of other mortgage bonds.—U.S. Mortgage & Trust Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co., C.C.A.Ill., 40 F.2d 386, certiorari dismissed 57 S.Ct. 756, 296 U.S. 668.

Terminal properties and freight classification yards

Where after-acquired property clause contained in each mortgage executed by predecessors of debtor railroad, which was reorganized, included all property thereafter to be acquired for use in connection with the railroad described in the mortgage, or with any part of it or with its business, the after-acquired property clauses were sufficient in scope to extend to terminal properties and freight classification yards subsequently acquired.—In re New York, S. & W. R. Co., C.C.A.N.J., 109 F.2d 988, certiorari denied New York Trust Co. v. New York, S. & W. R. Co., 60 S.Ct. 1075, 310 U.S. 633, 84 L.Ed. 1402 and Woodruff v. New York, S. & W. R. Co., 60 S.Ct. 1075, 310 U.S. 633, 84 L.Ed. 1403.

51 C.J. p. 845 note 51.

Specific enumeration

In railroad mortgage where paragraph of further assurance clause dealt with property not covered by the mortgage, the word "property" following specific enumeration of properties not subject to mortgage must be construed as referring to property of the same class as that specifically enumerated, or property not covered by the mortgage lien.—Empire Trust Co. v. to employ such expressions as "constructed and to be constructed,"[75] "completed or not,"[76] or "all property which may hereafter belong to said company and be used as a part of said road."[77]

In order to pass under a general description, however, the after-acquired property must ordinarily be such as appertains or is appurtenant to the road and is necessary to the enjoyment of the franchise or the operation of the road,[78] or such as is used in connection with the operation of the terminals and lines of the railroad,[79] or, if it is not such property, there must be a special description of it in the mortgage.[80] This does not mean, however, that the property should be property without which the railroad could not be operated; but it means all property reasonably necessary and convenient to the operation of the road, and includes such property as the company may thereafter deem it best to acquire for the most profitable use of the franchises and the greatest benefit to the public.[81]

"Property appertaining to or appurtenant." A general mortgage of a railroad company embracing its road and all after-acquired property appertaining or appurtenant to the road covers only lands which are appurtenant to, and connected with, the actual operation of the road;[82] and, therefore, does not include lands which do not appertain to, or are not so connected with, the road;[83] nor does such mortgage embrace lands which at the time of the execution of the mortgage the company had no right to accept and which are subsequently acquired under the authority of the legislature.[84]

(4) Legal or Equitable Interests

Words of general description convey property to which the mortgagor acquires either equitable or legal title.

Words of general description convey property to which the mortgagor acquires a full equitable title as well as that to which it acquires a legal title.[85]

(5) Lines Subsequently Constructed or Acquired

A mortgage on a railroad and all property thereafter to be acquired will embrace a portion of the road projected or contemplated at the time of the execution of the mortgage but thereafter completed, constructed or purchased, or an addition constructed by a purchaser from the mortgagor, but it does not include a line of road afterward unauthorizedly constructed or purchased

A mortgage on the road and all property, privileges, franchises, etc., acquired and to be acquired, will embrace a portion of the road projected or contemplated at the time of the execution of the mortgage but thereafter completed or constructed,[86] notwithstanding a change in the route if it is in the general direction authorized,[87] and although it is completed by a contractor on the company's failure to do so.[88] Such a mortgage will also embrace a subsequently purchased road or right of way which is within the chartered limits of the mortgagor company, and which it might have constructed if it had not been purchased,[89] or an addition constructed by a purchaser from the mortgagor.[90] Similarly such a mortgage may extend to double tracks substituted for a single track, although under a new franchise,[91] or to a subsequently acquired or constructed branch road or spur track,[92] although not in contemplation at the time of the mortgage;[93] and may be broad enough to embrace a leasehold of another road, subsequently leased to be used in connection with its own road,[94] but it does not include a line of road afterward unauthorizedly constructed[95] or purchased,[96] nor does it cover a lease, of its own road, to which the mortgagee was not a party;[97] or a separate branch road thereafter constructed under a special charter,[98] or amendment of its original charter;[99] or a subsequently purchased road which at the time of its purchase is not connected with the mortgagor's road.[1] A mortgage in terms limited to the road then owned does not cover an after-acquired line or extension,[2] although the extension was acquired through the exercise of the original franchise.[3] A mortgage by one rail-

Clause not limited to appurtenances

Where refunding mortgage contained an after-acquired property clause which was not limited to property appertaining to lines expressly mentioned in the first general mortgage, the refunding mortgage covered another railroad property which became a part of system of mortgagor, subject to purchase money first mortgage on such other property.—In re Wisconsin Cent. Extension acquired by use of bonds or proceeds

Where plan for financing railroad extension contemplated that fifty per cent of necessary moneys be secured through sale of first mortgage bonds, and first mortgage expressly covered extensions acquired by use of bonds or proceeds thereof, lien of such mortgage on the extensions should not be restricted to amount of first mortgage moneys used or proportion of such moneys to total cost, but should be recognized in full.—Ecker v. road company which built part of the road and then abandoned its operation does not cover that part of the road which is completed by another and separate company,[4] nor does a mortgage of the main line from one terminus to another and the franchises acquired and to be acquired pertaining to that line cover lands and franchises thereafter acquired through an extension of the road beyond one terminus, since the extension is not a part of the main line, or pertaining thereto, although acquired to be used in connection therewith.[5]

Consolidation. The mortgage may cover additions made after a consolidation with other companies[6] and change of name,[7] even though a successor is not mentioned in the mortgage,[8] but the mortgage will not extend to a line of railroad, not within the charter limits of the mortgagor, subsequently acquired by a consolidated company of which it becomes a constituent.[9] New construction by a successor, under a new franchise made possible by the surrender of the mortgagor's franchise, does not pass under the mortgage, even though such surrender might subject the successor to an action by the bondholders for waste.[10]

(6) Rolling Stock, Track, Rails, and Other Personal Property

Where the terms of the mortgage are sufficient to show such intention, a railroad mortgage will attach to after-acquired rolling stock and to other types of personal property, as well as to repairs, replacements, and additions or betterments to the mortgaged property.

Where the terms of the mortgage are sufficient to show such intention, a railroad mortgage will attach, in equity, to after-acquired rolling stock, as soon as it is acquired and placed on the road,[11] and this rule applies to other types of personal property,[12] such as tracks,[13] rails,[14] fuel,[15] office furniture,[16] and other supplies and personalty incident to and indispensable to the use and enjoyment of other property conveyed.[17] Such a mortgage covers repairs,[18] replacements,[19] and additions or better-

Rolling stock subject to equipment trust

(1) A railroad first mortgage referring to "after-acquired property" including property acquired for use in and for "maintenance or operation" of property subject to such first mortgage, and referring to rolling stock and equipment appurtenant to or used as part of any lines subject to the mortgage, covered railroad's equity in rolling stock subject to equipment trust which was used on all of railroad's lines.—Ecker v. Western Pac. R. R. Corp., Cal., 63 S.Ct. 692, 318 U.S. 448, 87 L.Ed. 892, rehearing denied 63 S.Ct. 935, 318 U.S. 803, 87 L.Ed. 1166, Crocker First Nat. Bank of San Francisco v. Western Pac. Bank of San Francisco, 63 S.Ct. 988, 318 U.S. 803, 87 L.Ed. 1167.

(2) A railroad mortgage providing that railroad could purchase and acquire equipment "free from the lien hereof" by lease, conditional sale or equipment trust, merely permitted purchase of equipment by equipment trust agreement and did not authorize completely untrammeled acquisition of such equipment free of the mortgage lien.—Ecker v. Western Pac. R. R. Corp., Cal., 63 S.Ct. 692, 318 U.S. 448, 87 L.Ed. 892, rehearing denied 63 S.Ct. 985, 318 U.S. 803, 87 L.Ed. 1166, Crocker First Nat. Bank of San Francisco v. Western Pac. Bank of San Francisco, 63 S.Ct. 988, 318 U.S. 803, 87 L.Ed. 1167.

(3) Where railroad mortgage clearly contemplated that it should be a lien on equipment second only to equipment trust agreements, railroad's equity in rolling stock subject to equipment trusts was subject to the mortgage, notwithstanding mortgage clause permitting acquisition of equipment by equipment trust "free from the lien hereof"—Ecker v. Western Pac. R. R. Corp., Cal., 63 S.Ct. 692, 318 U.S. 448, 87 L.Ed. 892, rehearing denied 63 S.Ct. 985, 318 U.S. 803, 87 L.Ed. 1166, Crocker First Nat. Bank of San Francisco v. Western Pac. ments to the mortgaged property.[20] It has been held that rolling stock is a fixture and passes regardless of an after-acquired property clause, by the doctrine of accession,[21] but on the other hand it has been held that rolling stock retains its character as personalty and does not pass under a real estate mortgage.[22] A mortgage, although in terms covering after-acquired rolling stock, does not attach to rolling stock temporarily placed on the road under a contract with the company then operating it.[23]

Consolidation. It has been held that the mortgage of the property of one railroad corporation, which was thereafter consolidated with another, did not extend to equipment acquired after the consolidation,[24] although the contrary has been held where the equipment was acquired to replace that mortgaged by one of the constituents.[25]

(7) Earnings, Income, and Other Funds

A mortgage of the future earnings of the road does not embrace the proceeds of a subsequent extension constructed under authority of an amendment to the charter of the company, but ordinarily the security extends to income subsequently accruing, even after default. Where the mortgage specifies the lines from which the income is to be derived, the lines described constitute the income fund pledged

A mortgage of the future earnings of the road does not embrace the proceeds of a subsequent extension constructed under authority of an amendment to the charter of the company, as against attaching creditors of such proceeds,[26] but ordinarily the mortgagee's security extends to income subsequently accruing, even after default.[27] When a railroad mortgage purporting to cover net income or earnings specifies the lines from which such income is to be derived, the lines so described constitute the income fund pledged,[28] and in ascertaining the net income the company cannot charge against the income of such lines the expenses or losses incurred in operating additional after-acquired lines.[29] A grant of the income and power over the income after default does not carry with it any other property,[30] and, where the mortgagor is entitled to the rents and income of the property until default, the interest accruing on an award for damages to the property goes to the mortgagor until default.[31]

Co. v. Southern Trust Co., C.C.A. Ark., 261 F. 765—Strang v Montgomery, etc., R. Co., C.C. Ala., 23 F.Cas. No. 13,523, 3 Woods 613.
51 C.J. p. 848 note 9.

Effect of specific provision in mortgage

(1) A true "replacement clause" exists when the railway is required to keep under the lien of the mortgage the same value or amount of equipment as had existed at the time of the execution of the mortgage.—In re Wisconsin Cent. Ry. Co., D.C.Minn., 68 F.Supp. 320, affirmed, C.C.A., Empire Trust Co. v. U. S. Trust Co. of N. Y., 165 F.2d 829.

(2) Where first general mortgage provided that railroad could dispose of obsolete equipment if railroad replaced it with new equipment which should become subject to the mortgage, bondholders under such mortgage possessed a lien on such new equipment.—In re Wisconsin Cent. Ry. Co., D.C.Minn., 68 F.Supp. 320, affirmed, C.C.A., Empire Trust Co. v. U. S. Trust Co. of N. Y., 165 F.2d 829.

(3) But this provision does not give rise to a lien equal to the original value of the equipment to which the lien originally attached, but bondholders were entitled only to a lien equal to the value of the present equipment which replaced the disposed of equipment which was subject to the lien.—In re Wisconsin Cent. Ry. Co., D.C.Minn., 68 F.Supp. 320, affirmed, C.C.A., Empire Trust Co. v. U. S. Trust Co. of N. Y., 165 F.2d 829.

(4) A refunding mortgage providing that railroad would maintain, preserve, and keep property in thorough working order and repair and would make all needful and proper renewals, replacements, repairs, etc., required railroad to make replacements so that the property could be operated safely and expeditiously, and the lien of the refunding mortgage applied to replacements.—In re Wisconsin Cent. Ry. Co., D.C.Minn., 68 F.Supp. 320, affirmed, C.C.A., Empire Trust Co. v. U. S. Trust Co. of N. Y., 165 F.2d 829.

(5) But such mortgage does not provide for a true replacement lien.—Empire Trust Co. v. U. S. Trust Co. of N. Y., C.C.A. Minn., 165 F.2d 829.

Net income

Where railroad mortgages covered rents, issues, profits, etc., and contemplated that the net income to be applied to the mortgage debt was the surplus left over after payment of all usual and customary outlays in the operation of the road, and receivership was instituted for the benefit of all creditors and trustee was subsequently appointed in railroad reorganization proceedings, the net income applicable to interest and bond principal was that remaining after all necessary additions, replacements, improvements, and restorations during the operation of the road after default had been deducted.—In re Wisconsin Cent. Municipal bonds issued to aid in the building of the road are not embraced in the general terms of an after-acquired property mortgage,[32] but such a mortgage covers a payment made to a railroad company for damages caused by a city in raising a certain grade.[33]

Consolidation. Where a consolidated company, successor to the mortgagor, sold mortgaged equipment, and placed the money in the general treasury of the company, such funds were held not subject to a lien in favor of the mortgagee.[34]

g. Estoppel of Mortgagor and Mortgagee

The mere fact that a mortgage declares that it is subject to certain prior mortgages which are superior liens on the property therein described does not estop the company to deny that such prior mortgages embraced certain property covered in the subsequent mortgage; and an erroneous recital of the resolution authorizing the execution of a mortgage does not estop the mortgagee to show the correct resolution.

The mere fact that a subsequent mortgage declares that it is subject to certain prior mortgages given by the railroad company and that they are superior liens on the property therein described does not estop the company to deny that such prior mortgages embraced certain property covered in the subsequent mortgage.[35] An erroneous recital of the resolution of the directors authorizing the execution of a mortgage does not estop the mortgagee to show the correct resolution authorizing a mortgage of after-acquired property.[36]

§ 289. —— Title or Interest Conveyed

Unless restricted to some particular interest or estate, a mortgage executed by a railroad company conveys all the title or interest which the company then has in the property therein described; and a mortgage of the lands is a mortgage of the fee.

A mortgage executed by a railroad company, unless restricted to some particular interest or estate, conveys all the title or interest, legal or equitable, which the company then has in the property therein described.[37] A railroad company's mortgage of its lands is a mortgage of the fee, although words of inheritance are lacking,[38] if other circumstances show an intention to mortgage the fee.[39]

§ 290. —— Debts and Obligations Secured

A mortgage given by a railroad company may not be enlarged so as to secure claims not secured by it; and what bonds or bonded indebtedness is secured by, or what bonds may be issued under, a railroad mortgage depends generally on the terms of the mortgage, construed in connection with the charter of the company and the surrounding circumstances.

A mortgage given by a railroad company may not be enlarged so as to secure claims not secured by it.[40] So, where the mortgage in terms secures an indebtedness of a specified class or kind, it may not be made to cover obligations or liabilities not falling within the designated class.[41] Under some statutes a mortgage may secure certificates of indebtedness to be delivered to creditors in exchange for existing debts and obligations to an equal amount as they shall be ascertained and liquidated.[42]

Bonds and coupons. What bonds or bonded indebtedness is secured by,[43] or what bonds may be issued under,[44] a railroad mortgage depends in general on the terms of the mortgage, construed in connection with the charter of the company or governing statutes and the circumstances attending the execution of the mortgage.[45] Thus, where the mortgage purports to secure certain coupons and bonds and substantially describes them, it will secure the debt evidenced thereby,[46] although the coupons and

Bonds issued by others
A first mortgage, guaranteeing payment of bonds, issued by subsidiary company and third railway company, for benefit of holders of first mortgage certificates, constituted se-

bonds were irregularly issued[47] So bonds dated prior to the date of the mortgage are secured thereby where they are clearly described in the mortgage and there is nothing in the mortgage inconsistent with the fact that they had been executed prior to the mortgage[48] Where a statute authorizes a general mortgage for the benefit of creditors but contains no provision for contingent liabilities, bonds of another company indorsed and guaranteed by the mortgagor company, but not yet due, are not covered by the security of such mortgage.[49] Where a mortgage provides for the retirement of certain bonds without providing for the manner of effecting such retirement, it has been held that the mode of retirement is in the discretion of the company,[50] and in order for a bondholder to participate in the security of the mortgage he must comply with the terms dictated by it.[51]

The general rule applicable to the construction of contracts that the contract will be given a reasonable construction, if that is possible, has been applied in determining what bonds may be issued under a mortgage,[52] and, even in the absence of specific authorization for the issuance of bonds for a certain purpose, such purpose may be found to be included in a general authorization contained in the mortgage.[53]

Where there is doubt or ambiguity as to whether certain bonds are secured by a particular mortgage, parol evidence has been received to remove such doubt,[54] as, for example, evidence that no bonds were executed or issued other than those which it is claimed the mortgage secures[55] If it clearly appears from the evidence that the bonds in question are the ones referred to in the mortgage, ordinarily this is sufficient to show that they are the bonds secured.[56]

A mortgage executed to secure bonds issued for a certain purpose does not secure bonds issued for a different purpose or bonds illegally issued,[57] except as bona fide holders for value and without notice may be entitled to protection in accordance with the rules stated supra § 253

The mortgagor of a railroad, if left in possession, may lease part of the real property covered by the mortgage; but this authority terminates on the breach of the conditions of the mortgage.

Before condition broken, the mortgagor of a railroad, if permitted to remain in possession and control of the property, may execute a lease of part of the real property covered by the mortgage,[58] but this authority terminates on the breach of the conditions of the mortgage.[59]

§ 292. —— Qualification, Tenure, and Removal of Trustee, and Selection of New Trustee

a In general

c. Selection of new trustee

a. In General

In the absence of special provision in the mortgage or deed of trust, a trustee is morally and legally bound to continue in the performance of his duties until discharged by an order of the court or by the unanimous consent of the cestuis que trust, but some mortgages recognize the right of a trustee to resign; and ordinarily on the vacancy of a trusteeship all the trustee's estate, right, interest, power, and control are divested.

In the absence of special provision in the mortgage or deed of trust, a trustee, once having assumed his office, is morally and legally bound to continue in the performance of his duties until discharged by an order of the court of chancery[60] or by the unanimous consent of the cestuis que trust,[61] which, in case a number of the cestuis que trust are under a disability, can be had only through the agency of a court of equity.[62] Some mortgages, however, recognize the right of a trustee to resign.[63] Mortgages or deeds of trust generally contain provisions as to the existence and effect of vacancies in the office of curity for full payment of interest on all such certificates, not merely on amount of bond secured by mortgage—Glines v. Henwood, C.C.A.Mo., 103 F.2d 226.

trustee, and it has been laid down that, since the trustee's duties are personal in their character and incapable of delegation, the office becomes vacant by his voluntarily removing to, and becoming a resident of, a foreign country;[64] but a citizen of the United States may act as trustee in any state in the Union.[65] Ordinarily, under the terms of the mortgage or deed of trust, on the vacancy of a trusteeship all the trustee's estate, right, interest, power, and control are divested and cease,[66] and the trust estate vests in the remaining trustee or trustees.[67]

b. Removal

A court of equity may, for a sufficient reason and on a proper application and notice, remove a trustee; but the power of removal is not absolute and may not be exercised capriciously

A court of equity may, for a sufficient reason and on a proper application and notice, remove a trustee,[68] independently of statutory authority or any directions in the mortgage or deed of trust.[69] The power of removal is not absolute, and a removal may not be made capriciously or except for sufficient causes, which affect the faithfulness and capacity of the trustee,[70] or the interest of the cestuis que trust,[71] or perhaps because of public interest[72] It is also well settled in chancery practice that trustees are not to be removed from part of their trust leaving them burdened and responsible for the remainder,[73] nor will they be discharged until the trust is fully performed where the interests of the cestuis que trust require the continuance of the trust.[74]

c. Selection of New Trustee

In case of a vacancy in the office of trustee, the mode of supplying the vacancy provided in the mortgage, if any, governs the appointment; but a court of equity may appoint a new trustee on due application independently of any statute or of any directions in the mortgage or deed of trust.

Ordinarily an express provision as to the mode of supplying vacancies in the office of trustee will be given effect;[75] and in such case the mode of supplying vacancies provided in the mortgage governs the appointment and not the general law,[76] nor does a statute govern where it makes provision for the method of appointment but by its terms applies only where no other method of filling vacancies is specifically provided for in the original appointment.[77] Thus effect ordinarily is given to provisions for appointment or selection by the remaining trustees,[78] as by appointment from among the bondholders,[79] or to provisions for selection by the bondholders,[80] for appointment by a designated court[81] on application by bondholders[82] or directors,[83] and to provisions for the approval by a designated court of the selection.[84] It has been held that, where the mortgage or deed of trust which provides for the filling of a vacancy by appointment by a particular court contains a specific provision for notice to certain officers of the corporate mortgagor or grantor, the jurisdiction of the court to appoint depends on such notice.[85]

A court of equity may, however, on the occurrence of a vacancy, appoint a new trustee on due application,[86] independently of any statute[87] or of any directions in the mortgage or deed of trust;[88] and to a proceeding in equity for such appointment the mortgagor[89] and surviving trustees[90] should be made parties. It has been held that the power of the court in this respect is not defeated by the formation of a new corporation by a majority of the bondholders,[91] or by a foreclosure promoted by the

Where the mortgage or deed of trust provides that the same title and power shall vest in the new trustees, no additional conveyance to them is necessary,[95] but the court which appoints a new trustee may properly make provision for a conveyance to the trustee so appointed.[96]

a. In General

In accordance with general rules the authority and duties of a trustee to whom a railroad mortgage is made for the benefit of bondholders are those defined by the instrument creating the trust and such other duties as are imposed on him by the circumstances, and ordinarily until default the trust is largely passive.

General rules as to the nature of the duties of trustees apply in the case of trustees under a mortgage or deed of trust given by a railroad company.[97] The authority[98] and duties[99] of a trustee to whom a railroad mortgage is made for the benefit of bondholders are those which are defined by the instrument creating the trust, and such other duties as are imposed on him by the relation of the parties and the situation and character of the trust property, which duties may change from time to time as circumstances change,[1] and in general the courts have no power to alter, modify, or enlarge the terms of the deed or the powers of the trustees.[2] Where, however, the rights and duties of the trustees are regulated by statute, no provisions need be inserted in the mortgage or trust deed in respect of such rights[3] and duties.[4]

Ordinarily until default the trust is largely passive,[5] or, as sometimes stated, the trust is entirely fiduciary and executory,[6] at least when the mortgage is amply secured,[7] and in practice the duties of the trustee are sometimes performed by the corporation or its officers;[8] but where, at the inception of the mortgage, there is practically no security, the trustee is required to be active in the performance of his duties.[9] The duties of the trustee are active and responsible after a default, either by nonpayment of interest[10] or principal,[11] or both.[12]

Recognition of bondholders. A trustee under a mortgage is bound to recognize the rights of the holders of bonds which are prima facie valid,[13] and, on the request of the requisite number of holders of such bonds, to declare maturity for default and to foreclose.[14]

Delegation of duties and performance of duties or enforcement of rights by another. A trustee cannot delegate the performance of his duties to another,[15] nor can anyone but the trustee enforce the covenants and conditions of the mortgage[16] or take proper measures to protect the interests of bondholders in respect of matters not provided for by the terms of the instrument.[17] Under certain circumstances, however, if, on the request of bondholders, a trustee in any case refuses or neglects to act, whatever rights as against the mortgagor are vested in the trustee inure to the benefit of the bondholders and are enforceable by them.[18]

Exercise of discretion. A trustee under a mortgage or deed of trust may exercise his discretion within the scope of his powers,[19] but whatever discretion the trustee may have may not be exercised in an unreasonable or arbitrary manner.[20]

Liability of trustees to bondholders in general. In general a trustee is liable to the bondholders for a breach of duty which, as trustee, he owes to them,[21] but, under certain circumstances, where, although the trustees have been guilty of a breach of trust, there is some excuse for their acts, they may be held liable only as trustees and not personally.[22] Where the trustee, in good faith, exercises discretion conferred by the trust instrument, he may not be held liable for his acts by bondholders,[23] even though it appears that a different course would have resulted more favorably to the bondholders.[24]

Rights with respect to illegal contracts made by mortgagor. A trustee under a mortgage of a railroad company has no greater right than the company itself to the benefit of an illegal traffic contract made prior to the execution of the mortgage.[25]

What law governs. The law of the state where the mortgage is executed and the mortgaged property situated furnishes the rule for determining the rights of mortgagees after condition broken.[26] A mortgage securing bonds of a railroad by a lien on its chattels is governed by the rule concerning chattel mortgages, and on default the mortgagee's title to chattels becomes absolute where the statute with reference to mortgages of chattels generally so provides.[27]

b. Certification of Bonds

A trustee who merely certifies a bond as one of the bonds issued by the mortgagor is not liable in respect of the bond because of the insufficiency of the security.

A trustee under a mortgage who merely certifies a bond as one of the bonds issued by the mortgagor is not liable in respect of the bond because of the insufficiency of the security, on the theory that such trustee was a guarantor[28] or that there was a breach of an inplied warranty.[29]

c. Protection of Security

The trustee must take care that the property is not wasted or depreciated.

The trustee must take care that the property is not wasted or depreciated.[30] Where under provisions of the mortgage, after default in payment of principal or interest, the trustee may take certain action to protect the interests of bondholders on request of holders of a specified amount of the bonds, the trustee may be forced to act under such provisions only on request of holders of such amount of bonds[31] Mortgagees of a railroad which is in the hands of a receiver have an interest giving them the right to object to claims being established against the road and given priority over their lien[32]

d. Rights as to Income

The trustee or mortgagee may claim the rents, earnings, or profits of the mortgaged property after default under the mortgage on duly asserting his right thereto, as by filing a bill for foreclosure or by demanding possession.

As has been noted, supra § 288 e, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the subsequent earnings and income of a railroad do not pass under a mortgage of its property while the company retains possession thereof, and in general the mortgagor continues to be entitled to the earnings and profits until the trustee has created a lien thereon, or otherwise established his right thereto, by a proper demand or proceeding.[33] In accordance with general rules and subject to applicable qualifications and exceptions, the trustee or mortgagee may claim the rents, earnings, or profits of the mortgaged property, after default under the mortgage, on making due assertion of his right thereto,[34] but he is not entitled thereto in the absence of a due assertion of his claim,[35] as by asserting his rights under the mortgage to the possession of the road by filing a bill for foreclosure,[36] or, if the road is in the hands of a third person, by demanding possession of such person.[37] So where, under the mortgage or trust deed, the only way in which the trustee can acquire the right to the tolls and income is by taking possession of the road as provided in the mortgage or trust deed, he may not claim, by virtue of the mortgage or trust deed, money voluntarily deposited to the credit of the trustee for the payment of coupons where he has not taken possession or run the road, or taken any action against the company by virtue of the trust deed,[38] but the trustee may acquire the right to a deposit where the mortgagor company in making the deposit expressly appropriates it to the use of the trustee for the purpose of paying coupons.[39]

Mortgage of earnings or profits. A mortgage of the income of a railroad company does not entitle the mortgagee to receive the income as long as the mortgagor company continues in possession of the road[40] unless the parties otherwise agree;[41] and even where the mortgage specifically includes the earnings and profits the necessity for some formal proceeding or demand has been recognized in order that the trustee or mortgagee may entitle himself to such earnings or profits[42] Entry into possession, under a mortgage of the income or a mortgage giving the trustee the right to enter and take the income on default, passes the income to the mortgagees,[43] as does a demand by the trustee that the mortgagor surrender possession according to the terms of the trust deed,[44] which demand may be in the form of a suit to enforce the security.[45] There is no such change of possession as to pass the income under the mortgage where a decree of foreclosure has been sought or granted but where no order has been entered by the court with respect to income or a change of possession.[46]

but not where the receiver is appointed on the application of stockholders,[48] or of individual bondholders suing as judgment creditors and not on the mortgage,[49] or otherwise where a receiver to carry on the business has been appointed by the court independently of action by the trustees to enforce the terms of the security,[50] or even after appointment of a receiver on application by trustees until his qualification by execution of the necessary bond.[51] Even then, the possession of the receiver is not strictly that of the mortgagee,[52] but is that of the court acting through its agent,[53] and the mortgagee's right to the income may be conditional on such disposition thereof as seems equitable to the court.[54]

e. Changing Securities

A trustee under a railroad mortgage has no power to change or compromise the security pending a default where such power is not expressly or impliedly conferred by the instrument creating the trust, although the right of the court to authorize the trustee to make a change has been recognized.

A trustee under a railroad mortgage has no power to change or compromise the security pending a default where such power is not conferred by the instrument creating the trust.[55] The power must be conferred either expressly or by necessary implication.[56] Under a clause in the mortgage providing for the substitution of other property in the event of sales of the mortgaged property on the basis of sale prices, the trustee cannot be compelled to release any mortgaged parcel or to apply the proceeds to the purchase price of substituted property without a showing that the prices were fair and adequate.[57] On the sale of property released from the lien of the mortgage by the trustee pursuant to a provision therein authorizing the release in the event of a sale and requiring the proceeds of such sale to be expended only to acquire permanent additions to the mortgaged railroad, the proceeds of the sale are trust funds in the hands of the trustee not subject to attachment by creditors of the mortgagor.[58] The right of the court to authorize a trustee to make a change in security where the interests of bondholders would be conserved by such change has been recognized or upheld[59] provided, according to some cases, at least some of the bondholders are made parties to the proceeding.[60]

f. Representation of Mortgagor and Bondholders

In matters affecting the enforcement of the security and the administration of the trust property under the terms of the trust, the trustee represents those who may become the holders of the bonds as well as the mortgagor, and is bound to act in good faith and exercise reasonable care and prudence for the protection of their interests.

While a trustee is selected by the mortgagor and represents it,[61] he also represents those who may become the holders of the bonds,[62] and he is bound to act in good faith and exercise reasonable care and prudence for the protection of their interests and must not be guilty of any acts of fraud or collusion.[63] Conversely, the bondholders or beneficiaries are bound by all acts within the scope of the trustee's authority done in good faith by such trustee on their behalf.[64] A trustee is a true representative only within the limits of his authority,[65] and in general the trustee represents the bondholders only in matters affecting the enforcement of the security and the administration of the trust property under the terms of the trust,[66] and not in a situation where his power is disputed and the interpretation of the language conferring it is ambiguous.[67]

In the absence of express provisions in the mortgage, the trustee has no power to waive or consent to the destruction of any rights which bondholders have under the mortgage,[68] even with the consent of a majority of the bondholders.[69] So a trustee has no power to waive defaults and release the mortgagor company from its obligations to the bondholders,[70] as, for example, to waive and condone defaults in the payment of principal or interest on the bonds,[71] or to assent to, and recognize the priority of, a later mortgage or lien over the mortgage securing such bondholder,[72] or in general to give effect to a reorganization scheme not authorized by the mortgage.[73] The authority of the trustee to assent to the acquisition by a third person of prior rights in property which otherwise would have come under the lien of the mortgage has been recognized.[74]

Class representation and discrimination. While the trustee owes a duty to the bondholders severally,[75] in general, in the absence of any provision to the contrary in the governing agreement, he represents the bondholders as a class.[76] In any case he may not favor any particular bondholder or group of bondholders or permit discrimination between them,[77] and he is not at liberty blindly to follow the advice or wishes of the majority unless specially authorized.[78] In respect of matters which are within the discretion of the trustee, however, he may properly be governed by the voice of the majority of bondholders secured, acting in good faith, and asking what is not inconsistent with the provisions of the trust.[79]

Estoppel of bondholders. Bondholders are not estopped by delay in taking action to deny the binding effect on them of an ultra vires act of the trustee affecting the interest of such bondholders where they have no knowledge, either actual or constructive, of such act.[80]

Notice to trustee as notice to bondholders. In general, notice to the trustee of matters within the scope of the trustee's duties or authority is notice to the bondholders.[81]

g. Sale of Property

While a trustee may sell the railroad or other trust property when empowered by the mortgage to do so, in the absence of express or implied authorization in the governing agreement he may sell only on authority from the court, and if he sells without authority he is personally liable for damages for his breach of trust.

A trustee may sell the railroad or other trust property where empowered by the mortgage to do so, provided he sells in the manner prescribed thereby.[82] In the absence of express or implied authorization in the governing agreement[83] the trustee may sell only on authority from the court,[84] and if he sells without due authorization it is a breach of trust which renders him personally liable for any damage to the bondholders occasioned thereby.[85] Even where the power to sell on a certain contingency is contained in the mortgage, the execution of such trust may be controlled by a court of equity at the suit of cestuis que trust.[86] Where a trustee is empowered to sell on such terms and conditions as he may deem best, he has power to warrant title to the property sold.[87] Where the sale is made by trustees and the company participates in the sale, it is estopped to deny the authority of the trustees to execute the deed conveying the land in question.[88] Likewise a bondholder may be prevented from attacking the sale as a breach of trust by participating in the transaction involving an unauthorized sale.[89] Where trustees convey land covered by the deed of trust, for their own personal benefit, such conveyance is voidable as against the cestui que trust,[90] although it may be valid as to one claiming by title adverse to that held by the railroad company.[91]

Expenditure of proceeds. A provision of the mortgage authorizing the expenditure of the proceeds of property sold, for the benefit of the mortgaged property, authorizes the trustee to expend such proceeds for the improvement of part of the line covered by the mortgage, although such part is subject to a prior mortgage.[92]

h. Lease of Property

After foreclosure and acquisition of possession by the trustees they may lease the road on such terms as they deem best; but the right of a trustee by oral assent to confirm a lease executed by the mortgagor after breach of conditions of the mortgage has been denied.

Although there is authority to the effect that trustees in possession of a mortgaged railroad have no power to lease it unless authorized by statute,[93] it has been held that after foreclosure for breach of conditions in the mortgage, and acquisition of possession by the trustees, they may, in the exercise of their discretion for the best interests of all parties in interest, lease the road[94] on such terms and conditions as the trustees may deem best,[95] particularly where the bondholders are in an unorganized state.[96] The right of a trustee by oral assent to confirm a lease executed by the mortgagor after breach of the conditions of the mortgage has been denied.[97]

i. Bidding on Property

Trustees may be empowered to bid in the property at a foreclosure sale, and it may be their duty to do so in order to protect the interests of the bondholders.

Trustees may be empowered by the mortgage to bid in the property at a foreclosure sale at the request of a majority of the bondholders,[98] or, even where the mortgage contains such provision, the trustee may have the right to purchase as against an assenting bondholder, by virtue of an order of the court on prescribed conditions, even though no request is made by a majority of the bondholders.[99] If necessary in order to protect the interests of the bondholders it may be the duty of the trustees to bid in the property in default of bidders, independently of an order and decree authorizing them to do so.[1]

(1) Possession

Under a mortgage reserving the management and control of the property to the mortgagor until default, the right of possession until such default is in the mortgagor; but generally after default and after foreclosure the right to possession is in the trustees.

Under a mortgage reserving the sole and exclusive management and control of the property to the mortgagor until default, the right of possession until such default is in the mortgagor.[2] Effect may be given to a provision of a railroad mortgage that the trustee may take possession on default by the mortgagor[3] when certain preliminary steps have been taken,[4] but it has been held that such preliminary steps must be taken in order to give the trustee the right to possession under the mortgage,[5] and that, where the trustee has obtained possession on default and the railroad company has paid all past-due installments and is in a condition to meet future installments, it may be entitled to a return of the possession of the property.[6] Apparently in recognition of the strict doctrine of the common law, it has been asserted that, in the absence of a stipulation in a mortgage giving the mortgagor company the right to retain possession until default, the mortgagee or trustee has the right to take possession at any time;[7] and, according to some cases, where default has occurred, the trustee has the right[8] and duty[9] to take possession for the protection and benefit of the bondholders, even though there is no express provision in the mortgage for taking possession. After a default and before an actual foreclosure of the mortgage the trustees are the only responsible parties with respect to the management of the property;[10] and they cannot be relieved from this responsibility except by a decree of a court of chancery.[11]

After foreclosure, although the contingent interests are mostly cut off and the number and character of the ultimate cestuis que trust very much changed, the duties of the trustees and the necessity of their continuing to act remain much the same.[12] Thus it is the duty of the trustee in possession after foreclosure to manage the property in a reasonably prudent and careful manner so as to keep it in a good state of preservation in order to make it available for the payment of the bonds, both principal and interest.[13] The duty of the trustee in this regard continues at least until some organization of the bondholders and the acquiring of some capacity to act by a majority, or in some such way as to enable them to discharge the new class of duties thrown on them by the breach of the condition of the mortgage and the surrendering of the road with its incidents and fixtures.[14]

The trustees' power to take possession must be exerted on all the property mortgaged.[15]

Conflicting claims to possession. The trustees' right to possession on default under a mortgage giving them such right is superior to that of a contractor who claims possession under a contract with the railroad company, and who holds bonds secured by the mortgage.[16] The view has also been taken that the trustee is entitled to take possession and operate the road, as against a permanent receiver appointed in proceedings to dissolve the company.[17] Since the legal title of the trustees to the property of the railroad company is only for the purpose of executing the trusts, and a court of equity has like power of execution, where such court has obtained possession of the mortgaged property it has been held it will not surrender it unless it is apparent that the trustees can better execute the trust in justice to all parties.[18]

(2) Operation

Trustees in possession have power to keep in repair and operate the road; they may use their own proper names or adopt any other name they may choose.

Trustees in possession have sufficient power to enable them to discharge the duties which the public has a right to demand in keeping in repair and operating the road,[19] at least where the mortgage authorizes the trustees to make such repairs and additions as they may deem expedient.[20] They may use their own proper names or adopt any other name they may choose,[21] and are not bound to do business in the name of the company to whose rights they have succeeded.[22] They may appoint an agent to manage the road without personally going on the premises themselves,[23] at least where the mortgage so provides.[24]

Statutory lien of state. Under a statute giving the state a lien for aid granted, certain state officers may take possession and operate the road on default.[25]

Agency as between mortgagor and mortgagee or trustee. There is authority for the view that a trustee in possession under authority of the mortgage is the company's agent in the management of the road and it is liable to third persons for his acts.[26] Where the mortgagee is entitled to the possession of property because of a default by the mortgagor, but permits the mortgagor to retain possession, it has been held that the mortgagor is the agent of the mortgagee in respect of procuring needed repairs of the property.[27]

Contracts. Trustees in possession of and operating a railroad are liable on the contracts of operatives employed on the road to the same extent as the corporation would have been had it continued in possession;[28] but a trustee entering into possession and operating the road is not bound by contracts made by the mortgagor while in possession under the mortgage[29] unless such contracts were expressly authorized by the mortgage.[30]

k. Individual Interest in Transactions

The mere fact of interest on the part of a trustee in a transaction is not sufficient to justify the court in withholding a confirmation of his acts, performed in good faith; but he should not put himself in a position which is antagonistic or hostile to the interests of the bondholders.

Where everything is honestly done by the trustee and the rights of others have not been prejudiced to his advantage, the mere fact of interest on his part in the transaction is not sufficient to justify the court in withholding a confirmation of his acts,[31] but the trustee should not put himself in a position or relation which is antagonistic or hostile to the interests of the bondholders,[32] as by acquiring adverse interests[33] or in any way promoting his own interest to the prejudice of the bondholders.[34] Thus, where he holds the legal title to the trust property for the benefit of its bondholders, he cannot speculate with the trust property.[35] He cannot purchase an outstanding title and hold it for his own use,[36] even though title is acquired by purchase at a judicial sale[37] or is superior to the one conveyed to him in trust.[38] Likewise, a trustee who has acquired such outstanding title may not require the company in an action of ejectment to refund to him the amount paid for such title.[39] The mere fact that some of the trustees were holders of bonds secured by their trust is not sufficient to make them incompetent to consent to a decree of foreclosure embodying a plan of reorganization.[40]

l. Compensation and Expenses

Trustees are entitled to reimbursement for all expenses reasonably and necessarily incurred in the execution of the trust, and to reasonable compensation for their services.

Trustees are entitled to reimbursement for all expenses reasonably and necessarily incurred in the execution of the trust,[41] such as reasonable counsel fees and costs expended in prosecuting and defending proper proceedings to protect the trust property,[42] and are entitled to reasonable compensation for their services,[43] including compensation for services rendered, and fees and costs in foreclosure proceedings,[44] provided such services or expenditures are within the line of the duties imposed on them by the instrument creating the trust.[45] In order that the trustee may be entitled to compensation or expenses, however, the services or expenditures must be reasonably necessary in the performance of his duties.[46] The trustee may be entitled to compensation or reimbursement for expenses under provisions therefor in the mortgage or trust deed,[47] and in general, where the compensation is fixed by the governing agreement, the trustee is entitled to the specified compensation,[48] and only to such compensation.[49] Where the mortgagor railroad company in the trust deed reserves the right to sell land subject to the mortgage and pay the proceeds of the sales thereof to the trustees after deducting expenses incurred in executing the trust, it may retain the proper amount for expenses in making the sales and may also pay the taxes out of the proceeds thereof.[50]

Lien or charge on property or proceeds. The right of a trustee to a lien or charge on the mortgaged property for compensation earned[51] and expenses properly incurred in the administration of the trust[52] has been recognized even in the absence of any provision in the trust agreement as to expenses.[53] It has been held, however, that, where the person claiming compensation and expenses acted in the capacity of mortgagee and not of trustee, he was not entitled to have the amounts claimed made a charge on the mortgaged property or proceeds,[54] and that a provision in the mortgage for compensation to the trustee for services which he may render does not give to such trustee a lien for his services[55]

Mortgagee in possession. A railroad company, as mortgagee in possession of a road, may incur only such expenses as are reasonably essential to the preservation of the mortgaged railroad as a going concern,[56] and if it is desired to make betterments, for the purpose of making the property more serviceable in connection with its other lines, that burden must be borne by the mortgagee.[57]

(1) In General

In some jurisdictions the courts deal with bondholders only through the trustees, and in proceedings affecting the trust to which the bondholders are not actual parties the trustee represents the bondholders.

In some jurisdictions at least the general rule is that the courts can deal with bondholders only through the trustee,[58] provided it appears that the bondholders can be fully and fairly represented and protected in their rights by the trustee.[59] So, in general, in legal proceedings affecting the trust to which the bondholders are not actual parties the trustee represents the bondholders,[60] and whatever binds the trustee, if he acts in good faith, binds the bondholders.[61] Some courts have stated the rule to be that generally, in defending or executing the trust, the trustee represents the bondholders,[62] but that a trustee who has no authority to consent to a modification of the mortgage has no implied authority to represent the bondholders in a suit for that purpose,[63] and that a trustee does not represent the bondholders in a suit to obtain authority not conferred on the trustee by the instrument or deed of trust,[64] as, for example, to authorize the disposition of the property not authorized by the mortgage,[65] or to permit the investment of funds in the hands of the trustee in securities other than those specified in the governing agreement.[66] In some jurisdictions, however, the trustee may represent the bondholders in a suit to authorize a change of securities.[67] Where the trustee under the mortgage is specifically authorized to represent the bondholders in any proceeding on the mortgage which they might deem necessary or expedient for the benefit of the holders of the mortgage, if legal action is necessary to protect the bondholders it is the duty of the trustee to take such action.[68]

Notice to trustee as party. In general a trustee who is a party to a bill in a suit in which a receiver has been appointed must take notice of orders to the receiver affecting the interests of the trustee.[69]

(2) Against Trustee in General

Where a trustee is remiss in the performance of his duties, the bondholders or the mortgagor may take proper action against him.

Where the trustees fail to perform their duties, through willfulness, indifference, or error of judgment, the bondholders or other beneficiaries who are aggrieved by their conduct may obtain relief in equity,[70] as by a bill to compel the trustee to take possession and manage the mortgaged property,[71] to compel him to apply properly moneys received as trustee,[72] or to compel him to take legal action to protect the interests of bondholders where the trust deed or mortgage authorizes the trustee to represent the bondholders.[73] Where the trustees abandon their trust or have been remiss in their duty, the bondholders or other beneficiaries may sue such trustees for damages sustained by reason of their misconduct,[74] and, as discussed supra § 292, may also take proper steps in equity to have them removed and new trustees appointed. Moreover the mortgagor company may, in a proper case, be entitled to relief in equity.[75] It has been held, however, that a holder of overdue interest coupons cannot maintain an action in his own name to compel a trustee to enforce payment of such bonds and interest by a sale of the property covered by the deed of trust, which was executed to secure a series of negotiable bonds with nonnegotiable interest coupons attached.[76] A stranger to the mortgage or deed of trust has no right of action against the trustee for the latter's alleged wrongful failure to cancel the mortgage or deed of trust.[77]

Parties, pleading, and evidence. The rules applicable in civil actions in general with respect to parties,[78] pleading,[79] and evidence[80] have been applied in actions against trustees. When it becomes necessary for a bondholder to reach property held by the trustee, he must proceed against the trustee, not for such bondholder's own separate benefit, but as a bondholder, and on behalf of the bondholders as a class.[81]

Bondholders

(1) Bondholders were necessary parties to proceedings between railroad company and trustee under railroad mortgages, where controversy involved question of trustee's right to purchase railroad's bonds with proceeds of condemnation of portion of mortgaged property.—Fonda, J. & G. (3) By Trustee or Mortgagee in General

The mortgagee or trustee may institute proper proceedings for the enforcement of his rights under a mortgage of railroad property.

At common law in some jurisdictions if the mortgagor company makes default in payment the mortgagee or trustee, being entitled to the possession of the mortgaged property, may maintain ejectment therefor.[82] In some jurisdictions a court of equity will not take possession and operate a railroad at the instance of a trustee or mortgagee except by an action to foreclose the mortgage,[83] but if the trustee is entitled on default to take possession under the terms of the mortgage, if prevented from doing so, he may, without bringing an action to foreclose, apply to a court of equity to be put into possession,[84] and a bill for the specific enforcement of the mortgagee's or trustee's rights is a proper remedy under such circumstances.[85] So it has been held that the remedy under a provision of the mortgage directing the trustee to take possession and sell on the request of a specified number of bondholders is merely cumulative and does not prevent the enforcement in equity of any rights or remedies in respect of possession which the law gives to the trustee as mortgagee.[86] The right of a trustee under a mortgage given by a railroad to sue to enforce a contract by which another railroad company agreed to furnish funds to pay interest on the mortgage bonds has been recognized where the trustee was a party to such contract.[87] When questions of difficulty arise, the trustee may apply to a court of equity for instructions in the execution of his trust.[88] For the benefit of bondholders a trustee may sue to compel the execution of a conveyance to the railroad company, under a contract of sale.[89] After condition broken the mortgagee may maintain an action for any material injury to the property which would amount to restrainable waste,[90] but the mortgagee cannot maintain an action before condition broken for waste which might have been actionable after condition broken.[91] Where the old trustees have been removed and new ones appointed, the latter are the proper parties to seek redress on behalf of the bondholders against third persons.[92]

(4) Injunctions

In a proper case a suit for an injunction may be brought by the bondholders, mortgagor, or subsequent encumbrancers against the trustees.

Bondholders may in a proper case obtain an injunction to restrain the trustees from giving effect to an agreement by which the rights of the bondholders are substantially affected,[93] or where a trustee incapacitates himself from discharging his duties an injunction will lie to restrain him from acting as trustee,[94] and from further prosecuting an action as such.[95] The mortgagor company may be entitled to an injunction to protect the trust funds.[96] So an injunction will lie at the instance of subsequent encumbrancers to restrain trustees under a prior mortgage from executing the trusts prejudicially to their interests.[97]

Likewise the remedy by injunction may be exercised in favor of a trustee or mortgagee acting under a railroad mortgage on all its property, for the security of bondholders,[98] and a mortgagee or trustee may at any time have an injunction to restrain waste which will impair the bondholders' security.[99] A mortgagee of an insolvent railroad company does not have such an interest in its un-mortgaged property, however, as will support a suit to enjoin a transfer thereof, in the absence of a showing that the mortgaged property was insufficient to pay the mortgage debt.[1] While the authority of a court of equity to enjoin an action at law in another state is generally recognized, as discussed in Injunctions § 49, it has been held that, where mortgage trustees of a railroad company as such have no property subject to sequestration within the state, an injunction will not lie to enjoin such trustees from prosecuting an action in another state, since there would be no means of enforcing the injunction.[2]

(5) Accounting

Trustees or mortgagees are bound to account for all profits or advantages obtained by them through their positions.

Trustees or mortgagees are bound to account for all profits or advantages obtained by them through their positions as mortgagees or trustees.[3] Trustees appointed by the court in pursuance of legislative authority may be ordered at any time on the application of a party interested, to report or account to the court, without any express provision to that effect in the statute or in the order of appointment.[4] The right which bondholders might otherwise have to compel an accounting in respect of a certain transaction may be lost by their repudiation of the transaction.[5]

Tender by plaintiff. The rule that, where a party seeking equitable relief is bound to pay some unascertainable amount before relief can be granted, it is not necessary to pay or tender the amount before bringing suit, but that it will be sufficient if he offers in his complaint to pay or perform whatever obligations rest on him in that respect, applies in a suit against a trustee to compel him to account concerning the trust fund or property,[6] especially where it appears that the trustee repudiated the trust before the action was brought.[7]

Parties and Pleadings. The rules applicable in civil actions generally, including suits for accounting, with respect to parties[8] and pleadings[9] have been applied in suits for accounting in which a trustee is defendant. One who is a sole trustee under a railroad mortgage is a necessary party to a suit against the railroad company for an accounting,[10] and on the failure to join him as such the bill should be dismissed.[11]

§ 294. Payment Over and Application of Subscriptions and Proceeds of Obligations and Securities

Where a mortgage provides for the application of the proceeds of bonds to certain purposes but does not provide how this is to be done, the mortgagor company or its officers have discretion as to the method of procedure.

Where a mortgage provides for the application of the proceeds of bonds to certain purposes but does not provide how this is to be done, it has been held that the mortgagor company or its officers have discretion as to the method of procedure.[12] Certain mortgages impose on the trustee the duty of applying the proceeds of sales of the mortgaged property to the payment of outstanding obligations of the mortgagor company.[13] Under other mortgages the holders of secured bonds are entitled to have the proceeds of sales of the mortgaged property applied in discharge of the bonds,[14] and, where trustees have sold part of the mortgaged property and have invested the proceeds in bonds secured by the mortgage, in general the bonds should be canceled.[15]

Where the charter of a railroad company recites the purposes for which the proceeds of bonds shall be used and a disbursement trust agreement is entered into in accordance with the terms of the charter, the duties of the disbursement trustee are regulated by such trust agreement and not by a prospectus under which the bonds are sold;[16] and such trustee is not liable to the bondholders where the proceeds are used in accordance with the trust agreement but not in the manner set out in the prospectus.[17] In such case there is not a fiduciary relation between the railroad company and the bondholder which will permit the bondholder to pursue the money as a trust fund where the company uses the proceeds for a purpose different from the purposes recited in the prospectus.[18]

Holders of bonds secured by a mortgage given by a railroad company may not hold another railroad company liable for the wrongful use of the proceeds of the bonds, although the mortgage provides that such other company should be the custodian of the bonds and the proceeds, where such other company has not assumed the supervision of the work for which the proceeds were used.[19] Holders of the bonds who acquire them with full notice of a misapplication of the proceeds cannot enforce them against the railroad company.[20]

Payment over of subscriptions or proceeds of bonds. A trust company is not liable to subscribers to a proposed issue of bonds to be secured by mortgage for moneys paid over to the railroad company where the receipt and payment over were controlled solely by a provision of the subscription agreement that the subscriptions should be paid to the railroad company at the office of the trust company which should give a receipt for payments,[21] but the trust company may be liable for moneys paid over in violation of the mortgage in which the trust company is named as trustee, after such mortgage has become operative.[22]

Bonds delivered to mortgagor for disposal. According to some cases provisions of the mortgage or trust deed that a specified portion of the bonds shall be delivered to the mortgagor company or to certain of its officers to be applied to certain specified purposes impress an express trust[23] or a lien or an equity in the nature of a trust,[24] in favor of the bondholders.[25] There is a breach of covenant where the company or its officers apply the bonds to other than the designated purpose.[26] While it has been held that an implied covenant of the trustee not to deliver bonds to the mortgagor under circumstances which would result in a violation of an express covenant of the mortgagor as to demand for, and use of, the bonds will not be read into a mortgage under seal where the mortgage contains no affirmative covenant of the trustee in this regard,[27] there is an implied duty or obligation on the trustee in such case arising out of the trust relation between the trustee and the bondholders,[28] and the trustee may be held liable to the bondholders as for a breach of trust where he fails to comply with this duty.[29] So, the view has been expressed that it is the right[30] and duty[31] of the trustee in the mortgage to see that a covenant as to the application of the proceeds is complied with.

A covenant in a mortgage to devote the proceeds of the bonds secured thereby to the improvement of the mortgage property for the benefit of future bondholders cannot, after such bonds are sold under an agreement by which the covenant is in effect abrogated, be enforced in equity by one who subsequently buys some of the bonds, not relying on the mortgage covenant, but on his own judgment, after full inquiry with knowledge of the exact situation, and who shows no actual or prospective loss by the transaction.[32]

which they attach.[33] The priority of liens or claims is sometimes regulated by agreement between the parties.[34] In general secured creditors are preferred to unsecured ones.[35] Equitable liens payable solely out of the earnings of the road should be paid out of the corpus of the property only after the mortgage bonds have been satisfied.[36]

Certificates of a receiver of a railroad issued to pay antecedent indebtedness have been held subordinate to a traffic lien.[37]

Concurrent liens. Liens which are concurrent, or which are made equal by the terms of the mortgage, have no preference as between themselves, but each lienor is entitled to his pro rata share of the fund or property to which the liens attach.[38]

Displacement of prior lien. Neither the railroad company[39] nor in general the courts[40] can displace a prior lien by a later one.

What law governs. There is authority for the view that the priorities of liens are determined by the lex fori.[41] Where a line extends through several states, priorities given by local law in a particular state have been given effect in respect of property in such state.[42]

§ 296. —— Necessity and Effect of Record or Registration

A railroad mortgage must ordinarily be registered or recorded in the prescribed manner in order that it may have priority over subsequent claims or liens.

A railroad mortgage must be registered or recorded in the prescribed manner in order that it may have priority over subsequent claims or liens,[43] unless, according to some cases, the subsequent lienor has notice of the prior unrecorded mortgage at the time he acquires his lien.[44] Thus, in order that a railroad mortgage may be effective as against subsequent lienors, it should be recorded in every county in which the road is laid provided the statute requires such filing.[45] An unrecorded or defectively recorded mortgage is inferior to a subsequent judgment,[46] or to a subsequent attachment lien covering the same property;[47] and the mere fact that a prior claim or lien may appear from the company's records does not give it precedence over subsequent liens on the same property.[48] Priority once acquired by the recording of a mortgage is not lost by the subsequent record of another instrument purporting to affect such priority.[49]

An unliquidated claim is inferior to a subsequent mortgage which is recorded before the claim is reduced to judgment.[50] Bona fide holders of over-issued bonds have an equitable lien which, although unrecorded, is superior to the unrecorded lien of income bonds subsequently issued,[51] but inferior to that of a subsequently recorded mortgage.[52] It has been held that the mere recording of a mortgage for which the mortgagor receives no consideration does not give priority over a subsequently attaching lien.[53] A purchase-money mortgage need not be recorded in order to be valid against claims under a prior mortgage covering after-acquired property.[54]

Special statutes applicable to the registration or record of railroad mortgages sometimes apply so as to affect priority.[55] Thus, by virtue of a special statute exempting railroad mortgages from the requirement that mortgages shall be recorded in the town where the mortgaged property lies, a failure to record a railroad mortgage in such town does not affect the priority of such a mortgage as against an attaching creditor.[56] Where a statute provides for filing in a particular office but does not provide any penalty or consequence for failure so to file, the priority as between the mortgage and the claim of an attaching creditor must be determined by the general law applicable to the rights of attaching creditors.[57]

Rolling stock, supplies, etc. Where, under the particular statute, a mortgage purporting to cover rolling stock, supplies, and other personal property, unless recorded in the manner prescribed for chattel mortgages, is invalid as far as such property is concerned, a mortgage which is not so recorded is not entitled to priority over the claims of subsequent levying creditors and encumbrances of the railroad company;[58] but the rule is otherwise where a mortgage which includes both real and personal property need not be recorded as a chattel mortgage.[59] The lien of such a mortgage, although covering after-acquired property, is subject to the lien or rights of one who thereafter conditionally sells or leases cars or other rolling stock to the railroad company with reservation of title or lien, although the agreement or instrument of reservation is not recorded;[60] and this rule is not affected by a statutory provision requiring the reservation in such cases to be in writing and recorded, since such provision is intended only for the benefit of subsequent purchasers and creditors of the vendee.[61] It has been held that, where such lease or conditional sale amounts in fact to a mortgage, unless it is acknowledged and recorded as a mortgage, it will not establish a lien as against attachment and execution creditors,[62] or purchasers from the railroad company[63]

§ 297. —— Priorities between Mortgages and Other Claims in General

a. In general
b. After-acquired property

a. In General

As a general rule, as between a mortgage of railroad property and other claims constituting liens thereon, that which is prior in time is prior in right.

As a general rule, as between a mortgage of railroad property and other claims constituting liens thereon, that which is prior in time is prior in right,[64] except as to certain varieties of liens specially favored by law, as discussed infra §§ 301-304, or as to liens which are given preference by an agreement between the parties.[65] Certain statutory liens are sometimes given priority over the claims of persons holding under a mortgage.[66]

Ordinarily, a railroad mortgage takes precedence over debts due general creditors of the mortgagor company whether created before[67] or after[68] the giving of the mortgage, unless such creditors have a prior equitable right.[69] Likewise, such mortgage has priority over contract obligations of the mortgagor company incurred before[70] or after[71] the giving of the mortgage. In the absence of an agreement otherwise, where certificates of indebtedness secured by a mortgage are exchanged for preferred stock, the holders of such stock are merely stockholders and hold it in subordination to the claims of the residue of the holders of the certificates of indebtedness, under the mortgage.[72]

A mortgage made to secure bonds to be thereafter issued does not give priority over liens of other creditors which attach to the property before bonds are actually issued under the mortgage to bona fide holders.[73] Where the mortgage covers only the net earnings of the railroad, the right of persons who have claims in respect of current expenses in the operation of the road to a preference over the mortgage, in respect of gross incomes or tolls, has been upheld.[74] Where the mortgagor is entitled to rents and income from the mortgaged property until a receiver is actually appointed, the fact that the income of the railroad is covered by the mortgage has been held not to entitle the mortgagee, at least as against other creditors, to income accruing before the appointment of a receiver.[75]

Lien or claim of judgment creditor. In general, judgment creditors should be postponed to prior mortgages.[76]

Mortgage of consolidated company. The lien created by a mortgage executed by the consolidated company after a consolidation on the consolidated property takes precedence of any unsecured claims of creditors of the constituent companies.[77]

Recognition of priority. A mere recital in a mortgage that certain stock in a terminal company, owned by the mortgagor company, is conveyed by the mortgage subject to the provisions of a prior stock trust agreement under which such terminal stock was deposited with a trustee is not a recognition of a priority of lien on all the property of the mortgagor company under such stock trust agreement which of itself gave no such priority.[78]

b. After-Acquired Property

The lien of a mortgage covering after-acquired property operates on the property only in the condition in which it is at the time it is acquired or attaches only to such interest as the mortgagor company acquires.

The lien of a mortgage covering after-acquired property operates on the property only in the condition in which it is at the time it is acquired, or in other words, attaches only to such interest as the mortgagor company acquires;[79] and, therefore, is subject to any covenant, lien, encumbrance, or other charge existing on the property at that time, although junior in point of time,[80] such as a mechanic's lien[81] or purchase-money mortgage.[82]

Such mortgage, however, may be enforced against the mortgagor company and all persons claiming rights which have accrued after the mortgage attached,[83] and especially as against claimants under a

Status of purchase-money mortgage

(1) Where bonds issued under railroad mortgage were devoted to reimbursement of railroad for expenditures made in acquisition and construction of terminal and other railroad properties formerly belonging to another company, the mortgage was entitled to status of a purchase-money mortgage, notwithstanding proceeds of bonds were used in reimbursement for prior expenditures and an interval elapsed between acquisition of property and execution of mortgage, since test was whether deed of acquisition and the purchase-money mortgage were part of continuous transaction, regardless of whether they were executed at same instant.—In re New York, S. & W. (2) The creation of railroad and terminal company, which took title to railroad properties prior to consolidation with debtor railroad which subsequently was reorganized, and covenant in consolidation agreement which provided for execution of a mortgage constituting first lien on property acquired by the debtor through the consolidation, in accordance with terms of an arrangement for a loan which was arranged by the company, was not fraudulent as to debtor's preëxisting creditors who held mortgages covering after-acquired property of debtor.—In re New York, S. & W. junior mortgage which, by its terms, is subject to the prior mortgage,[84] and against junior judgment creditors.[85] This latter rule, however, is subject to the qualification that, although the railroad mortgage is subject to liens and charges existing at the time it is acquired on rolling stock and other loose property susceptible of separate ownership and of separate liens,[86] with respect to rails and other articles which become affixed to, and a part of, the railroad, the lien of a prior mortgage will prevail in favor of bona fide creditors as against any encumbrance thereon in favor of the furnisher of the property,[87] as, for example, a reservation of title in such furnisher or seller.[88]

§ 298. —— Liens or Claims Arising Out of Grant of Public Aid

a. In general
b. Bonds secured by statutory lien and indorsed by state

a. In General

The priority of a lien on railroad property in favor of a state, county, or municipality as security for its issuing or indorsing bonds or subscribing to stock in aid of the company is usually regulated by the statute, or provision of the constitution, authorizing the granting of such aid.

The priority of a lien on railroad property in favor of a state, county or municipality as security for its issuing or indorsing bonds or subscribing to stock in aid of the company is usually regulated by the statute, or provision of the constitution, authorizing the granting of such aid.[89] Some statutes expressly provide that such liens shall be prior and superior to all liens or encumbrances created by the company and all other claims existing or to exist against it.[90] Persons dealing with a railroad company are bound to take notice of a public statute giving a state or a county a lien on railroad property for public aid granted to it,[91] and, therefore, such lien is superior to claims of purchasers of the property of such company,[92] and to its bonds issued under a mortgage subsequently executed,[93] and to the holder of a tax certificate which, by statute, is receivable by the company for freight and passage.[94]

Under such a statute, however, where first mortgage bonds are transferred to the state as security for bonds issued by it in aid of a road, the state as holder of such first mortgage bonds has no priority over other bonds of the same issue held by individuals.[95] The lien or claim under such a statute may be subordinate to the interest and claim of a vendor of railroad property reserved in the deed of conveyance,[96] to the lien of a person who has recovered judgment for the value of his land taken for the road,[97] or to mortgagees who have become such under a subsequent statute authorizing the railroad company to borrow money and mortgage its property.[98] Moreover, where the state has by statute expressly waived its priority, it cannot thereafter repudiate its action so as to affect a lien which arose under such statute.[99]

b. Bonds Secured by Statutory Lien and Indorsed by State

In general, the holders of bonds issued by the railroad company, secured by a statutory lien or mortgage, and indorsed by the state, are entitled to priority over junior encumbrancers.

In general, the holders of bonds issued by the railroad company, secured by a statutory lien or mortgage, and indorsed by the state, are entitled to priority over junior encumbrancers,[1] and this priority cannot be taken away by legislative enactment.[2] Holders of bonds or coupons may, however, by their acts, lose the right to claim priority.[3] Thus, where the holders of coupons of bonds issued under a particular statute accept in payment bonds issued under a later statute giving them a preference over the earlier bonds, and such statute is subsequently declared unconstitutional, in so far as it attempts to give such preference, the holders of such new bonds are estopped from claiming under the earlier act.[4] This estoppel is purely personal and does not proceed from any supposed relation between the coupons funded and the bonds from which they were taken.[5] In such case there is no presumption of fact that at the time of funding persons owning the coupons also owned the bonds of the earlier issue to which such coupons had been attached,[6] and persons holding such coupons uncanceled are entitled to prove their claims in the same manner as the original holders of unfunded coupons.[7]

Where certain holders of first lien bonds are estopped to assert a preference by reason of their having accepted bonds of another issue, the holders of the first bonds not so estopped are not bound to share their prior lien with the holders of later bonds to the extent that the first lien was removed by the estoppel.[8] New bonds received, pursuant to a statute, for coupons of bonds issued under an earlier statute, by way of substitution for such coupons are entitled to the same rank and priority as the original debt,[9] and are entitled to priority over bonds under a mortgage given intermediate the enactment of the two statutes.[10] A lien under a mortgage to secure the purchase price of part of the right of way is superior to the lien of bonds indorsed by the state under a statute enacted prior to such mortgage when the lien of such bonds was to operate on each separate section of the railroad as it was completed and as the bonds were issued and indorsed.[11] Where the lien of the state is foreclosed, the holders of overdue and unpaid coupons have no right to a preference over the bondholders.[12] Neither the railroad company nor subordinate claimants can successfully object to the grant of priority to holders of such bonds on the ground that such holders have not attempted to obtain payment from the state.[13]

§ 299. —— Liens or Claims for Right of Way or Land Granted

In general, a lien on lands transferred to the railroad company is superior to subsequent liens.

In general, a lien on lands transferred to the railroad company is superior to subsequent liens.[14] So, except where the vendor has waived his right to priority,[15] or the vendor's lien is a secret one of which the mortgage bondholders had no notice,[16] the lien of a vendor of land sold or taken for railroad purposes for the unpaid purchase price thereof or for just compensation, if no price has been fixed, is superior to that of a mortgage on the road,[17] although the mortgage contains an after-acquired property clause,[18] particularly where the mortgage is a subsequent one,[19] and where the sale is a conditional one.[20]

It has been held, however, that, after a sale on foreclosure of a mortgage containing an after-acquired property clause, a vendor's lien in respect of a portion of the right of way acquired by the mortgagor company after the execution of the mortgage may not be enforced.[21]

§ 300. —— Liens or Claims for Rolling Stock Furnished

The lien of a mortgage on a railroad covering after-acquired property is inferior to a valid lien or claim on rolling stock existing when such rolling stock comes into the possession of the mortgagor company.

The lien of a mortgage on railroad property covering after-acquired property is inferior to a valid lien or claim on the rolling stock existing when such rolling stock comes into the possession of the mortgagor company,[22] as, for example, to the rights or lien of a seller of rolling stock under a conditional sale,[23] although in the form of a lease,[24] or to a bona fide lessor of such rolling stock, with reserva-

On the other hand, the lien of such a mortgage is superior to a claim for rolling stock acquired after the mortgage pursuant to a transaction which, while nominally a lease, is actually a purchase by the mortgagor,[26] to a claim of a manufacturer who relies on the credit of the company and on an indorser of notes taken by him from the railroad company in payment,[27] and to the rights of a manufacturer who delivers the rolling stock without any condition or reservation as to payment.[28] So a mortgage covering after-acquired property is superior to a lien or claim on subsequently acquired rolling stock in favor of a lessor of real property under a statute giving a lien to a landlord on personal property of the tenant used on the premises where the lien of the mortgage attaches before the rolling stock comes on the leased premises.[29] Such a mortgage is also superior to a lien or claim on subsequently acquired rolling stock where the transaction under which the rolling stock is acquired is a mere device on the part of persons who are in a position to control the corporation to prevent the property from coming within the operation of the after-acquired property clause.[30]

Where the general funds of the company are employed to discharge equipment liens, bondholders secured by a general mortgage may not claim priority over a first lien mortgage because the proceeds of the bonds purchased by them augmented such general fund.[31]

§ 301. —— Liens or Claims for Construction, Labor, and Supplies

a. In general
b. Statutory provisions

a. In General

Ordinarily, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, the lien of a mortgage or other encumbrance is superior to unsecured claims for material or labor furnished, especially where such claim is subsequent in time to the lien of the mortgage or other encumbrance.

Ordinarily, the lien of a mortgage or other encumbrance is superior to unsecured claims for material or labor furnished,[32] especially where such claim is subsequent in time to the lien of the mortgage or other encumbrance,[33] unless such claims are given priority by statute, as discussed infra subdivision b of this section. The right of persons claiming under a statute giving them a lien on the road built by the railroad company, to claim priority as against a contractor in respect of a part of the road subsequently built by such contractor under an agreement giving him title to the part of the road so built until payment for materials and labor should be made, has been denied.[34]

Where material is sold to the mortgagor company which when attached to the road becomes a fixture, or an integral part of the railroad, in general the lien of a prior mortgage covering after-acquired property is superior,[35] even though there is a reservation of title on behalf of the seller of the material,[36] as, according to some cases, is the lien of a subsequent mortgage taken without notice,[37] but not the lien of a subsequent mortgage taken with notice.[38]

Under equitable principles, however, where the railroad company is insolvent, the priority of claims for materials or labor required in the operation of the road over the lien of mortgage creditors, or other secured debts, in respect of the current income of the road, is sometimes recognized,[39] and, where the current earnings have been used for other purposes, priority may, under certain circumstances, be extended so as to include the corpus of the mortgaged property or its proceeds.[40] In order that this priority may be claimed, in general it must appear that the person who furnished the labor or supplies relied on the fact that the current earnings would be applied to the payment of his debts, and that he should not have contracted on the personal responsibility of the railroad company or of another.[41] Moreover, the expectation that the claim shall be paid out of current earnings is not of itself sufficient to make the claim a preferred one.[42]

Equitable rights in respect of original construction and permanent improvements. The equitable principles in question do not in general authorize priority for unsecured debts or claims for original construction,[43] or for repairs so extensive as to amount to permanent improvements.[44] Claims for construction performed after the giving of the mortgage have been given a preference in equity over the lien of the mortgage where the trustee under the mortgage advanced moneys thereunder with the knowledge and intention that such moneys would be used for construction and participated in the disbursement of such moneys.[45]

b. Statutory Provisions

The rights of laborers and materialmen to priority over mortgages and other encumbrances on railroad property are in some jurisdictions expressly regulated by statute.

The rights of laborers and materialmen to priority over mortgages and other encumbrances on railroad property are in some jurisdictions expressly regulated by statute.[46] Under some statutes a person who furnishes labor and materials for constructing a railroad, and who complies with certain statutory requirements, has a lien on the road for the amount due him therefor in preference to mortgages and other encumbrances on the road given after the actual commencement of the work of construction.[47] Some statutes of this description have been construed as giving superiority to a claim or lien based on the furnishing of material or the performance of labor after the mortgage was given where the construction of the road was commenced prior to the giving of the mortgage,[48] and this superiority is operative as to the whole road,[49] even though it is built in sections and the material or labor for which the lien is claimed was furnished or performed only for a particular section;[50] but the superiority does not extend to a lien based on repairs made after the completion of the road, although the mortgage was given in the course of, but after the commencement of, original construction.[51]

Such claims for labor and material are generally not entitled to preference over mortgages or other encumbrances on the road given before the work was commenced,[52] or before the statute took effect.[53] A recorded mortgage held by the trustee before any bonds are issued or any mortgage debt created is held by such trustee merely as the agent of the railroad company, so that mechanics' liens which attached prior to the issuance of any bonds are prior in lien,[54] and the superiority of the claim for labor and material has been upheld where, at the date of the execution and delivery of the mortgage, the proposed railroad had only a nominal existence and possessed no right of way or franchises and the mortgage was given and the money was advanced thereon for the sole purpose of bringing into existence the property on which the mortgage was intended to rest.[55]

Certain statutes applicable to corporations, giving superiority to existing debts and contracts of the corporation over the lien of a mortgage, have been construed as not applicable to railroad companies.[56]

Notice of lien. Under many of the statutes the superiority of the statutory lien depends on the giving of due notice by claimant,[57] although the prosecution of the work may be sufficient notice[58]

Waiver or estoppel. The view has been taken that the right to claim superiority for a lien or claim for labor or materials is not waived or lost by a provision of the contract reserving a lien to the contractor,[59] by giving credit beyond the statutory time for enforcing the lien,[60] or by taking a note for the claim.[61] The lien claimant is not estopped to claim the superiority of his lien over a mortgage lien merely because he was a stockholder of the construction company which gave a guaranty in respect of the security for the bonds issued under the mortgage, where it is not shown that he was a party to such guaranty.[62]

§ 302. —— Liens or Claims for Loans or Advances or for Incurrence of Liability

In general the lien of a mortgage is superior to the claim of a general or unsecured creditor for advances or loans to the mortgagor.

In general the lien of a mortgage is superior to the claim of a general or unsecured creditor for advances or loans to the mortgagor,[63] and the lien of a prior mortgage covering after-acquired property is superior to the claim of a person who advanced the money to obtain certain property, title to which has vested in the mortgagor company, where the holder of the mortgage bonds took without notice of such claim.[64] However, one who has advanced money to pay for certain railroad property, taking title to himself as security, has a lien thereon superior to the mortgagees of the railroad company with notice,[65] and any change in the form of the obligation to him short of an actual payment does not extinguish his right to priority[66]

Moreover, under equitable principles, in the case of insolvent corporations claims based on obligations incurred or advances made in certain circumstances for keeping the road a going concern,[67] or for discharging liens or charges superior to the mortgage lien,[68] may be given priority over the lien of a mortgage in respect of income[69] and even in respect of the corpus of the mortgaged property where the claim arises out of a transaction which resulted in saving the mortgage security.[70] An equitable lien for money loaned, acquired through a clear intent on the part of the railroad company to give security on the property of the company, is enforceable against third persons who were either volunteers or took the property on which the corporation had agreed to give a lien, with notice of the agreement.[71]

§ 303. —— Liens or Claims for Damages

In the absence of statute a judgment for damages is not entitled to priority over preëxisting liens.

In the absence of statute a judgment for damages is not entitled to priority over preëxisting liens.[72] Under some statutes, however, a judgment for damages in respect of property,[73] or for personal injuries,[74] for which the railroad company is responsible, is superior to the liens of mortgages. Some of the statutes do not create a lien in respect of the enumerated claims,[75] but operate to postpone liens created by the railroad company to the satisfaction of claims of the preferred class.[76] A statute which gives priority to a judgment for personal injuries in respect of any and all other judgments, executions, or attachments except as stated, and which makes no mention of mortgages, has been construed as not giving priority in respect of a mortgage given prior to the injury.[77]

The constitutionality of such statutes, applicable to transaction subsequent to the enactment of the statute, has been recognized[78] in respect of injuries occurring after the mortgage was given.[79] Some of these statutes have been construed as not to give a preference over mortgages or liens in existence at the time of the passage of the act.[80] The provision as to reference back of a judgment, in a statute providing that a judgment for personal injury or for injury to property shall relate back to the date when the cause of action arose and shall be a lien as of that date of equal force and effect as certain specified liens and shall take precedence and priority of any mortgage given to secure the payment of bonds, refers to the specified liens other than mortgages,[81] and does not prevent the preference over a mortgage of a judgment for an injury which occurred subsequent to the giving of the mortgage.[82]

Under some statutes claims are not entitled to priority until they have been reduced to judgment, even though an action thereon is pending,[83] but it has been held that the priority may be asserted where the claim has become liquidated by a settlement with the company, although the statute expressly refers to a judgment.[84]

Under equitable principles in the case of an insolvent railroad company a claim for damages to abutting property resulting from the construction and operation of a railroad may be entitled to priority over a mortgage of the road.[85]

Effect of lease. A statute giving priority to a judgment for damages does not, according to some cases, apply to a judgment against a lessee of a railroad so as to render it a lien on the property superior to a mortgage given by the lessor prior to the lease;[86] but it has been held that a judgment against the lessor company may, under the statute, be entitled to a preference over a mortgage given by such company.[87]

Costs. The costs necessarily resulting from the action to procure judgment to which a statute gives priority and to enforce the lien are entitled to like priority.[88]

Contract by purchaser of railroad to pay judgment. The lien of a trustee and bondholders under a mortgage is superior to that of one claiming under an agreement by the mortgagor railroad company to pay as part of the purchase price any judgment that might be recovered in a personal injury action against its vendor, in so far as the trustee and bondholders are purchasers for value without notice.[89]

Waiver or estoppel. Claimant may, by his failure to assert his claim in due time, lose his right to a preference.[90]

§ 304. —— Liens or Claims for Rent of Road, Track, or Terminal Facilities

In general, the lien of a mortgage is superior to an unsecured claim for rent of road, track, or terminal privileges.

In general, the lien of a mortgage is superior to an unsecured claim for rent of road, track, or terminal privileges,[91] but a court of equity has given preference to such a claim in respect of the income of insolvent railroads.[92] A lease reserving payment of rent out of the tolls, fares, and income of the road may constitute a lien thereon in priority to subsequent mortgages.[93] Claims for rent have been regarded as superior in equity to the payment of interest on bonds in the hands of bondholders who had guaranteed the payment of the rent.[94] Where the lessor company covenants to keep up its organization and make all reports required by law, such agreement implies that it is to be done at the expense of the lessor company, and, therefore, such expense is not a lien on the property of the road superior to that of bondholders claiming under a mortgage executed by the lessee company [95]

§ 305. —— Priorities between Different Mortgages

a. In general
b. After-acquired property

a. In General

The order of priority of different railroad mortgages on the same property ordinarily depends on the order in which they have attached as liens on such property.

The order of priority of different railroad mortgages on the same property ordinarily depends on the order in which they have attached as liens on such property.[96] A junior mortgage is, however, sometimes given priority by statute [97]

Retention of priority in hands of purchaser of mortgaged property. A prior mortgage on railroad property may, by agreement between the vendor and purchaser who agrees to assume and to pay the mortgage and the bonds issued thereunder, be kept operative in the hands of the purchaser for its security so as to be superior to subsequent mortgages existing when the purchase was made.[98]

Expenditures by mortgagee in possession. Expenditures by a railroad company in possession as mortgagee for the convenience and improvement of its line as a system which includes lines not covered by the mortgage may not be made the basis of a lien prior to the lien of a mortgage subordinate to the mortgage under which possession was held,[99] but, where the expenditure was one which was necessitated by the character of the mortgaged property and was ordered by the public authorities, the claim therefor is entitled to priority over the lien of the subordinate mortgage.[1]

b. After-Acquired Property

A railroad mortgage covering after-acquired property ordinarily has priority over a subsequent mortgage on the same property.

A railroad mortgage covering after-acquired property ordinarily has priority over a subsequent mortgage on the same property,[2] as, for example, a mortgage executed by a subsequent grantee,[3] or by a consolidated company,[4] and the fact that a certain portion of the road is built with money raised on the later mortgage does not give such mortgage priority over an earlier one.[5] The fact that some of the bonds secured by a mortgage containing an after-acquired property clause are used to pay for certain after-acquired property does not

Even if the relied-on provision of the mortgage could be held to be a consent that lien of subsequent refunding and general mortgage should rank its own, such consent merely subrogated refunding and general mortgage to position of priority of lien of the consolidated mortgage, and had no effect on order of priority between that mortgage and an income mortgage which, although senior to refunding and general mortgage, was junior to consolidated mortgage.—Bankers Trust Co. v. Callaway, supra.

Provision for substitution in event of sale

Under provision of first mortgage of railroad property for substitution of other property after sale of mortgaged parcels, trustee under subsequent refunding mortgage could not deprive first mortgagee of improvements made by lessee on original mortgaged site of relocated tracks after merger of mortgagor with lessee, notwithstanding loans made to pay for improvements were discharged with proceeds of loan secured by refunding mortgage and good-faith assumption of trustee under refunding mortgage that original site of tracks had been released and refunding mortgage constituted first lien, in absence of statutory recordation of sale of original site of tracks and of purchase of substituted parcel.—In re New York, N. entitle the mortgage to a prior lien on such property as against earlier mortgages which contained the same clauses, in the absence of an agreement express or implied that the bonds should be so used and a lien should attach,[6] although where property is acquired by moneys raised under a mortgage under circumstances in which it is plain that the later mortgage would not have been created and utilized to acquire such property without the safeguard of a first lien, then property so acquired is not first subject to the lien of a prior mortgage, unless the prior mortgage, by express language, warns subsequent mortgagees that such after-acquired property will be subject to the lien of the prior mortgage.[7]

As between two mortgages covering after-acquired rolling stock given by different companies which were subsequently consolidated, the mortgage of the company which originally owned rolling stock replaced by the purchase of other rolling stock after consolidation has been regarded as superior in respect of the rolling stock so purchased.[8] A mortgage of a branch line under a special act providing that it shall be a first lien thereon takes precedence of a prior mortgage of the railroad as then "made or to be made."[9]

A mortgage existing on a railroad at the time it is purchased by another railroad company is superior to a mortgage of the latter company on its road and which attaches to the newly acquired road,[10] and, similarly, where mortgages given by two railroad companies both contain after-acquired clauses, and thereafter one of the railroads purchases the other, the mortgage given by the purchasing railroad which antedates that given by the absorbed railroad constitutes a prior lien.[11] A mortgage covering after-acquired property is superior to a chattel mortgage given by the contractor for construction, who was also the general manager of the railroad company, to a director and general counsel of the railroad company, who had participated in the transaction resulting in the execution by the railroad company of the after-acquired property mortgage.[12]

§ 306. —— Priorities between Holders of Bonds or Debentures and between Debentures and Other Claims

The priorities of the holders of railroad bonds depend largely on the terms of the contract under which the bonds were acquired, although priority may be affected by the equities of the particular case.

The priorities of the holders of railroad bonds depend largely on the terms of the contract under which the bonds were acquired,[13] although priority may be affected by the equities of the particular case.[14] Ordinarily, outstanding bonds of a prior issue are entitled to priority over a subsequent issue of bonds,[15] particularly where a decree of foreclosure of the mortgage under which the latter bonds are issued declares the outstanding bonds a first lien on the road or the proceeds of its sale,[16] and this preference passes to a bona fide holder of such bonds.[17] The mere fact that unsecured bonds were issued before secured bonds does not make such unsecured bonds a lien on the corporate property superior to such secured bonds, although the statute under which the unsecured bonds were issued provided that bonds issued should be binding on the property of the mortgagor.[18]

Bonds of the same issue and secured by the same mortgage stand on an equal footing, regardless of the time at which the various bonds are negotiated;[19] and the fact that part of an issue of bonds is issued as the purchase price of certain property gives the bonds so used no prior lien on such property over other bonds of the same issue.[20] Income bonds entitled to a preference out of the capital stock and income have no priority over mortgage bonds out of the proceeds of the latter.[21]

A guarantor of railroad bonds secured by mortgage, who has made only a partial payment thereof, is not entitled to an equal footing with the holders of bonds issued under the mortgage on the ground of subrogation.[22] Consent by holders of a portion of first mortgage bonds to the issue of preference bonds of like character to be a lien on the road prior to their bonds is in equity a mortgage or pledge of such holder's interest in the first mortgage to secure the payment of the preference bonds,[23] and does not change the rights under the mortgage of the non-assenting bondholders.[24]

§ 307. —— Priorities in Respect of Interest or Interest Coupons

Where a lien is entitled to priority over another lien, the priority usually extends to the interest to which the preferred lienholder is entitled.

Where a lien is entitled to priority over another lien, the priority usually extends to the interest to which the preferred lienholder is entitled.[25] In the absence of some provision in the mortgage to that effect coupons severed from negotiable bonds secured by a mortgage on railroad property are not entitled to priority of payment over the principal of the bonds[26] or the coupons subsequently maturing,[27] and it has been held that, where bondholders have a remedy for enforcing the payment of interest in case of default and they fail to enforce such remedy, they have no claim for priority in the distribution of the proceeds of foreclosure over other bondholders of the same class who have received interest.[28]

On the other hand, in determining the equities involved, it has been held that unpaid coupons should be paid before the principal of any of the bonds,[29] and before coupons or interest falling due at a later period;[30] and detached coupons in the hands of others than the holders of the bonds from which they were detached should be paid before such bonds.[31] Where a particular transaction amounts to a payment of coupons, the right of the person who takes them up to share equally with the holders of secured bonds or coupons has been denied.[32]

A mere promise or stipulation in notes given for money borrowed to pay interest on bonds that a certain amount of the gross earnings is pledged in liquidation of the new securities does not create a specific lien or equitable assignment so as to give a holder thereof priority over the bonded debt out of such earnings.[33] A provision in income bonds recognizing the priority of other outstanding bonds in respect of interest has been given effect.[34]

Partial priority. Where, under a valid statute a railroad company is authorized to issue bonds bearing a certain rate of interest, which bonds are to have priority over bonds theretofore issued, the priority does not obtain to interest in excess of the statutory amount.[35]

Priority over floating or current debt. Interest on bonds may by agreement be made subordinate to current or floating indebtedness.[36]

sence of contract, interest may be recoverable by way of damages for unreasonable delay in the payment of moneys due from the company.[39]

Unless otherwise provided by statute, the interest on bonds of a railroad company may be made payable at stated intervals during the life of the bond, and the company may not be restricted to the payment of interest only at maturity of the principal.[40]

The fact that, when an installment of interest falls due, the company has no money with which to pay it does not, unless otherwise provided by the obligation, relieve the company from liability therefor.[41]

A demand for interest due on bonds is sufficient if made by the holders of the bonds or coupons at the place where they are payable,[42] and a further demand by the mortgage trustee is not necessary.[43]

Where a temporary bond is issued under a trust indenture, exchangeable for bonds to be issued, and there is no requirement of exchange in the trust indenture or in the temporary bond, the failure of the holder of such temporary bond to exchange does not affect his right to interest paid to a trustee,[44] nor is it his duty to collect each payment of interest as and when it is made to the trustee.[45]

Transfer of obligation. When bonds or other obligations of a railroad company are transferred, they carry with them, unless otherwise agreed, the right to interest accruing thereon;[46] and a bona fide transferee has the same rights with respect to the interest as with respect to the principal.[47] A subsequent sale of a certificate of deposit representing a temporary bond, after the accrual of interest but prior to its collection, has been held not to carry with it the right to the interest on deposit with the trustee.[48]

Effect of receivership or insolvency. After railroad property has passed into the hands of a receiver or of an assignee in insolvency, interest on debts of the railroad company ordinarily is not allowed against funds in the receiver's hands[49] unless there are funds in the hands of the receiver or his privies especially applicable to the payment of the claim and which would not be exhausted by the allowance of interest.[50]

b. Interest Coupons

Interest coupons on railroad mortgage bonds may be negotiable instruments which may be detached from the bonds and reduced to judgment by the holder separately from the bond.

Interest coupons on railroad mortgage bonds may be negotiable instruments which may be detached from the bonds and reduced to judgment by the holder separately from the bond,[51] although where a trust indenture made a part of the coupons by reference vests the sole right of action on the coupons in the trustees named in the indenture the coupons are nonnegotiable.[52] Until detached and separately negotiated, an interest coupon is merely an incident of the bond to which it appertains.

Duty of trustee

Where the mortgage indenture further provides that on deposit by the mortgagor railroad with the trustee of an amount sufficient to pay the semi-annual interest on coupon bonds, to be held and applied by the trustee as a special trust fund for payment of the interest coupons on presentation, the mortgagor shall thereafter be discharged of liability to pay such interest, the trustee thereupon holds such deposits in trust for the benefit of persons who are the owners of the bonds at the time when the instalments of interest fall due, whether the bonds are still in temporary form or have been exchanged for the permanent form with coupons attached—Girard Trust Co v. Indorsement of interest payments

A requirement that interest payments be indorsed on interim certificate exchangeable for railroad bond was made solely for protection of the trustee under the railroad mortgage, and could not affect rights of original holder of interim certificate against purchasers of certificate of deposit issued by such original holder, representing the bond with interest due after specified date—Girard Trust Co. v. tains,[53] and is without greater force than any other promise for the payment of interest.[54] An agreement by the lessee of a railroad to pay interest on bonds issued by the lessor company constitutes a promise to pay the coupons attached to such bonds.[55]

The character of such coupons is not changed by detaching them from the bond,[56] but a holder of detached coupons is bound by the conditions of the bonds to which the coupons were attached, as to the amount payable and the manner of recovering it, the same as though the coupons had not been detached,[57] and, although an action may be maintained on the coupons without production of the bond,[58] a recovery must be based upon the obligations contained in the bond.[59] A provision that detached coupons shall not be entitled to any benefit under the mortgage except after the prior payment in full of the principal of the bonds and of all coupons not detached does not in any manner modify the obligation of the company to pay such coupons or the interest by them represented,[60] but merely subordinates the rights of the holders to participate in the security afforded by the mortgage.[61] The holder of overdue interest coupons ordinarily is entitled to recover interest on the amount thereof from the time they are payable.[62] In some jurisdictions, however, a bondholder may be denied interest on overdue interest coupons,[63] even though an express promise to pay such interest was made when the bonds were issued,[64] and even though the debtor may be able to conduct its business affairs without the aid or benefit of this rule.[65] A nonnegotiable coupon has been held not to bear interest after maturity in the absence of an express provision therein for such payment.[66]

In the absence of other significant circumstances, the right of a holder of a matured coupon to receive interest is determinable by the place where the coupon is payable,[67] and, where there is nothing to evince a contrary intent, it will be presumed that the parties to a coupon contracted with reference to the laws of the place where the coupon was payable.[68]

c. Rate of Interest

Subject to general laws relating to usury, and to any special statutes or regulations applicable to railroad companies, a railroad company may contract as to the rate of interest it shall pay on its indebtedness.

Subject to general laws relating to usury, and to any special statutes or regulations applicable to railroad companies, a railroad company may contract as to the rate of interest it shall pay on its indebtedness.[69] An increase in the rate of interest on outstanding bonds at the time of consolidation of the railroad company by which such bonds were issued with other companies does not constitute a violation of a statute prohibiting the issue of bonds or other evidences of debt in connection with consolidation.[70] It has been held that the reservation of an illegal rate of interest will not prevent a recovery of the original debt with legal interest.[71]

Where a mortgage provides for a certain interest until maturity, but is silent as to the rate of interest thereafter, the statutory rate will be applicable after maturity,[72] and it will not be implied that the contract rate is to continue.[73]

Special statutes. A statute prescribing a maximum rate of interest on railroad indebtedness but permitting the sale of notes and bonds at a prescribed discount in effect and to that extent exempts railroad companies from the operation of the usury laws,[74] and so a company may contract to pay interest at a rate equivalent to that which would be payable on funds obtained by the issuance at the permitted discount of a note or bond bearing interest at the rate prescribed by statute.[75] Similarly, a provision in the charter of a railroad company authorizing it to borrow money on such terms as may be agreed on by the parties empowers it to contract to pay a rate of interest greater than that established by the general law of the state.[76] A statute prohibiting railroad companies from borrowing money at more than a specified rate of interest has no application to undertakings issued for other purposes, and does not invalidate a promise therein to pay a greater rate of interest than that prescribed by the statute.[77]

§ 309. —— Waiver, Loss, or Bar of Right to Interest

The right to interest on bonds or other obligations of a railroad company may be waived or lost by the acts of the holders or obligees.

The right to interest on bonds or other obligations of a railroad company may be waived or lost by the acts of the holders or obligees,[78] although the right to assert such waiver may itself be lost by conduct inconsistent therewith.[79] Such right to interest may also be lost or barred by the performance or nonperformance of conditions contained in the bond or other obligation or in a mortgage or trust deed under which it was issued,[80] and thus, where the income bonds and mortgages provide that no interest shall be recovered until the board of directors shall have adjudged and awarded an ascertained amount as net earnings, there can be no recovery of interest until such amount is adjudged and awarded[81] unless the directors improperly neglect or refuse to take the necessary action.[82] Where mortgage bonds provide that no more interest shall be payable than shall be certified by a vote of the majority of the board of directors to have been earned by the company during the preceding interest period, and that in default of such certificate no interest shall be payable, interest cannot be recovered on such bonds unless the certificate has been made[83] or unless it has been unreasonably refused after a request therefor.[84] Similarly, where it is covenanted that the principal of bonds selected by drawing lots at stated intervals shall be payable at the option of the holders on the surrender of such bonds, and that interest thereon shall cease at a certain date, interest on bonds so selected ceases at the time specified, whether or not they are surrendered,[85] since the option of the holders applies only to their right to retain possession of the bonds.[86]

a. In General

The gross earnings and income of a railroad company should be applied first to the payment of the necessary expenses and liabilities incident to the maintenance and operation of the road, then to the payment of interest on obligations, and then to the payment of liens in the order of their priority.

The gross earnings and income of a railroad company constitute a trust fund, in the hands of its officers, for the payment of its debts,[87] since ordinarily this is the only fund to which unsecured creditors may have recourse,[88] and should be applied first to the payment of the necessary expenses and liabilities incident to the maintenance and operation of the road,[89] then to the payment of interest on obligations,[90] and then to the payment of liens in the order of their priority.[91] Accordingly, as long as there are outstanding unliquidated debts which equitably have the right to have the income applied to the satisfaction thereof, a bondholder cannot compel its appropriation to the liquidation of his claim.[92] All the provisions of a bond must be considered in determining what income the holder should receive.[93]

Subject to the rules just stated, and in the absence of contract liens, or rights created by legal proceedings, the officers of a railroad company may exercise a reasonable and proper discretion as to the order in which its debts shall be paid,[94] and this discretion cannot be taken from them by notice to the company that a particular creditor intends to demand a preference.[95] The payment of net income to bondholders may rest in the discretion of the officers,[96] and the retention of net earnings as to a particular class of bondholders, and their application to betterments, may similarly be discretionary with the officers of the railroad.[97] Where a claim is a lien on property of the railroad company, however, the mere fact that it is a claim of a certain class so far as payable out of the earnings of the road does not preclude its payment from the proceeds of a sale of the property on which it is a lien if the earnings are insufficient to pay it.[98] Losses incurred prior or subsequent to a period during which earnings have accrued cannot be set off against or absorbed by such earnings, as against the rights of creditors to payment therefrom.[99]

Trust fund or sinking fund. Where a trust fund is created to secure a particular class of creditors only, creditors of such class may rightfully be paid

Railroad in possession of court

The net earnings of a railroad in possession of the court and operated by it are not exclusively the property of a mortgagee, but are subject to the payment of claims found to have superior equities, and debts accruing in earning the income must be paid therefrom before any part thereof may be applied to the use of the mortgagee.—In re Chicago, R. Accrual of current claims

Although the time within which current claims must have accrued in order to constitute current expenses payable from a railroad's current income before the application thereof to a mortgage depends on the facts and circumstances of each case, a six-month period has long been generally recognized as reasonable in most instances, and this established practice has become largely accepted commercially.—In re Chicago, R. Amounts payable out of earnings in lieu of interest

If payment of net income to debentures rested in directors' discretion, the question in determining right of debenture holders to recover amounts payable out of earnings in lieu of interest would normally be whether directors' discretion had been abused, which is the usual rule in suits to compel declaration of dividends.—Williams v. Green Bay & W. R. Co., supra.

97. Wis.—Biltchik v. Green Bay & W. R. Co., 26 N.W.2d 633, 250 Wis. 177, certiorari denied 68 S.Ct. 216, 332 U.S. 834, 92 L.Ed. 408

Where all gross earnings of railroad had been properly applied by directors, in that all not paid as interest, as dividends and as income had been consumed in operating expenses and maintenance of physical properties, holders of debentures could not complain that they should have been paid a larger dividend at the expense of maintenance of railroad.—Biltchik v. Green Bay & W. R. Co., supra.

Provision for determining income payable

Holders of debentures were not prejudiced by fact that railroad directors had not always acted strictly in accordance with provisions of debentures for determining amount of income payable on such debentures where earnings were all in fact applied to proper purposes to advantage of railroad and to advantage of such debenture holders thereby enhancing value of their debentures.—Biltchik v. Green Bay & W. R. Co., supra.

out of such fund without regard to other creditors.[1] As between creditors of the same class, if the fund applicable to their claims is insufficient to pay all, it should be divided among them pro rata.[2]

Mortgagees of stock of lessor railroad company. Bondholders to whom stock of a railroad company has been mortgaged as collateral security cannot in equity charge a lessee of the mortgaged road with earnings derived under the lease where there is no fraud in the lease,[3] nor are the earnings received by the lessee of the road impressed with a trust for the benefit of such mortgagees;[4] and the management controlling the lessor company is not bound to manage it exclusively in the interest of the mortgagees.[5]

b. Sinking Funds

A sinking fund for the payment of bonds of a railroad company, where provided for or required by statute or agreement, ordinarily is to be created and maintained only out of the net income of the company remaining after the payment of operating expenses and interest.

A sinking fund for the payment of bonds of a railroad company, where provided for or required by statute or agreement, ordinarily is to be created and maintained only out of the net income of the company remaining after the payment of operating expenses and interest.[6] Where the net income is insufficient to pay into the sinking fund the sum contemplated by the statute or agreement, the company cannot be required, unless otherwise provided, to make up the deficiency from income subsequently received,[7] although it has been said that the mere fact that the company is unable to make the required payments into the fund does not relieve it of its duty so to do.[8]

A sinking fund is a trust fund for the benefit of holders of the bonds for the payment of which it is created and maintained,[9] and so, when the property of a railroad company by which such a fund has been created is sold under a decree of foreclosure, bondholders are entitled to have the fund applied to the payment of their bonds as against all rights of holders of deficiency judgments entered in the foreclosure suit.[10] Where the statute or agreement providing for a sinking fund requires its investment in designated securities, the court is without authority to authorize a different form of investment without the consent of the bondholders.[11]

Unless otherwise provided, trustees of a sinking fund who use it to purchase outstanding obligations are bound to cancel those so purchased,[12] and they may not exercise any voting rights appurtenant thereto;[13] but where the agreement for the sinking fund provides that obligations so purchased shall remain in force and that interest on them shall be paid by the company and added to the fund, such interest payments must continue until the maturity of the mortgage.[14] A plan for the creation and maintenance of a sinking fund may be altered or abrogated and a different provision therefor made as long as the rights of the bondholders are not injuriously affected.[15]

c. Interest Payable Out of Particular Fund

Where a bond of a railroad company, or the trust deed under which it was issued, provides that interest on such bond shall be paid out of a particular fund, it is the duty of the trustee so to apply such fund.

Where a bond of a railroad company, or the trust deed under which it was issued, provides that interest on such bond shall be paid out of a particular fund, as from the proceeds arising from the sale of certain lands,[16] or the income of the road,[17] it is the duty of the trustee so to apply such fund; and if during a particular interest period the fund is insufficient to pay in full the interest then accruing the deficiency will accumulate and become a charge on such funds subsequently realized[18] unless such cumulation clearly appears to be contrary to the intention of the parties.[19]

d. Diversion of Funds

The trustee under a trust deed securing bonds of a railroad company must take care that the company's income applicable to the payment of principal or interest on the mortgage debt is not improperly diverted therefrom.

The trustee under a trust deed securing bonds of a railroad company must take care that the company's income applicable to the payment of principal or interest on the mortgage debt is not improperly diverted therefrom.[20] It is a diversion or misapplication of funds to apply the income of the company to the payment of a debt or obligation while obligations having priority thereof are outstanding, without the consent of the superior obligees,[21] even though such application could be made on favorable terms and would be equitable,[22] and would probably be in the interest of the holders of such superior obligations.[23]

Creditors whose funds have been misapplied are entitled, to the extent of the misappropriation, to priority of payment out of funds otherwise applicable to the claims of the creditors who were improperly paid.[24] The fact, however, that claims not entitled to preference have been improperly paid from funds in the hands of receivers does not entitle a mortgagee to insist that the amount shall be deducted from funds applicable to preferred claims.[25]

e. Compelling Proper Application of Income

A contract creditor of a railroad company may maintain an action to enjoin a diversion or misapplication of the income or earnings of the company or to compel the application thereof to the payment of the proper indebtedness.

A contract creditor of a railroad company may maintain an action to enjoin a diversion or misapplication of the income or earnings of the company[26] or to compel the application thereof to the payment of the proper indebtedness;[27] or, where there has been a failure properly to apply the income or earnings, the creditor may bring a bill in equity for an accounting[28] except where the obligation to such creditor is merely contractual and not fiduciary.[29] Where there has been a misapplication, the creditor may recover in an action at law the amount of the fund which should have been applied to his claim.[30] The income of the road may also be attached by a trustee process for operating expenses.[31]

Right to inspection of balance sheet. Where a railroad mortgage gives bondholders the right to inspect the company's statement of earnings, interest, etc., the extent of their right depends on the reasonable intent of the language of the mortgage;[32] but in the absence of provision therefor bondholders have no right to such an inspection.[33]

§ 311. Maturity, Payment, Satisfaction, Release, or Discharge

a. In general
b. Payment before maturity
c. Payment in medium other than money
d. Surrender of evidence of indebtedness
e Release or discharge

a. In General

Payment of railroad bonds may be made on presentation to the issuing railroad or its fiscal agent.

Payment of railroad bonds may be made on presentation to the issuing railroad or its fiscal agent.[34] Bonds of a railroad company may be paid and discharged by the issuance and acceptance of new bonds[35] and must, as to unsecured creditors, be deemed paid and canceled by such a substitution where the transaction would otherwise operate in fraud of their rights.[36] Payment of railroad bonds must be made in currency which at the time of payment is legal tender.[37]

Payment of the amount due on an obligation by another than the debtor company, without intent to extinguish the obligation and without any belief on the part of the former holder that it is extinguished, constitutes a purchase and not a payment or extinguishment;[38] and, where trustees under a mortgage executed by a railroad company purchase in their individual right a portion of its property at a foreclosure sale under a prior mortgage, their purchase cannot be treated as a payment of the mortgage on behalf of the company.[39] An officer of a railroad company who advances money with the understanding that he should be subrogated to the rights of the creditor against the railroad will not, in the absence of an express agreement with the debtor or creditor, be entitled to subrogation.[40]

Merger with stock. As a general rule the union in the same person of title to the stock and bonds of a railroad company does not work a merger thereof, when none is intended and the interest of the mortgagee does not require it.[41]

Acceleration, extension, and waiver of default. Although bonds are issued under a trust agreement giving the trustees the option to declare the principal due in case of default in the payment of interest, the holders of such bonds have no right so to accelerate the maturity thereof unless expressly given such power.[42] A provision in a trust deed authorizing bondholders to waive any default under its provisions does not authorize the waiver of payment of interest or interest coupons when due, or an extension of the time of payment thereof,[43] except where expressly otherwise provided,[44] but only a waiver of the power to declare the principal due under an acceleration clause;[45] nor does it authorize the waiver of an anticipated default.[46] Where such power to waive defaults is exercisable by a specified majority of the bondholders, it must be strictly exercised in order to be binding on the minority,[47] and an agreement by the required majority which does not purport to be binding on other bondholders, and which amounts only to an arrangement between the parties, is not effectual as a waiver.[48]

b. Payment before Maturity

Holders of bonds of a railroad company are not required, in the absence of a provision therefor in their bonds or in the trust deed under which such bonds were issued, to accept payment of the amount thereof before maturity.

Holders of bonds of a railroad company are not required, in the absence of a provision therefor in their bonds or in the trust deed under which such bonds were issued, to accept payment of the amount thereof before maturity,[49] and a statute, the effect of which is to make a mortgage debt become due before the time fixed in the mortgage, is unconstitutional and cannot be enforced.[50]

c. Payment in Medium Other than Money

Where a railroad company's promise to pay bonds or their interest is in the alternative, to pay either in money or some other medium of payment, the company has an option when payment falls due to pay money or to pay its equivalent in the other medium specified.

Payment in gold coin

Gold clauses in railroad bonds issued respectively in 1903 and 1930 were not contracts for payment in gold coin as a commodity or in bullion, but were contracts for payment of money intended to afford definite standard or measure of value and thus to protect against depreciation of currency and against discharge of obligations by payment of lesser value than prescribed, and such contracts were not repugnant to federal law when made.—Norman v. Cumulative power

Where the remedies given the trustees were expressly declared to be cumulative, a bondholder, in the absence of an express provision to the contrary, could declare the bonds due in the event of default, and, under such circumstances, the bondholder was entitled to use the bonds as a set-off against debts owed the railroad.—Lowden v. Iowa-Des Moines Nat. Bank & Trust Co., D.C. Iowa, 10 F.Supp. 430, affirmed, C.C.A., Iowa-Des Moines Nat. Bank & Trust Co. v. Where a railroad company's promise to pay bonds or their interest is in the alternative, to pay either in money or in some other medium of payment, such as scrip, the company has an option when payment falls due to pay money or to pay its equivalent in the other medium specified[51] unless its right to exercise such option has been waived.[52] When the time for payment has passed, however, without payment having been made, the company's option is lost and the promisee becomes entitled to receive payment in money;[53] and the fact that he has accepted another medium for past payments does not amount to a waiver of such right.[54]

d. Surrender of Evidence of Indebtedness

Except where otherwise provided by the terms of a bond or other obligation of a railroad company, the surrender and delivery to the company of the evidence of indebtedness is not a prerequisite to the right to receive payment of the amount due thereon.

Except where otherwise provided by the terms of a bond or other obligation of a railroad company, the surrender and delivery to the company of the evidence of indebtedness is not a prerequisite to the right to receive payment of the amount due thereon.[55] So a railroad contractor who has negotiated notes received in part payment of his claim is not first required to take up such notes before obtaining a judgment and lien for his services, but the judgment may provide for their payment out of the sum allowed.[56]

e. Release or Discharge

A claim against a railroad company or a lien on its property may be released or discharged by any subsequent agreement between claimant and the company which shows an intention to adjust all existing controversies between the parties and mutually to release all existing obligations and liabilities.

A claim against a railroad company or a lien on its property may be released or discharged by any subsequent agreement between claimant and the company which shows an intention to adjust all existing controversies between the parties and mutually to release all existing obligations and liabilities;[57] but a mere change in the form of a mortgage debt, such as the substitution of new bonds for those originally secured, does not extinguish or affect the lien.[58] Where a railroad company pledges its own bonds as security for a debt, payment of the debt discharges the bonds.[59] The purchase of its bonds by a railroad company from the trustee before maturity and the pledge of them pursuant to a plan showing an intention to keep them alive will not constitute an extinguishment of such bonds.[60]

A court of equity may compel the trustees under railroad mortgage indentures to release a portion of the track or other property from mortgage liens,[61] as where a radical change in the situation occurred since the trust indentures were executed,[62] or where the liability of the land for taxes might be expanded.[63] The bondholders must be sufficiently represented in such proceeding,[64] as by a protective committee,[65] and the trustees and a single bondholder under each mortgage indenture are insufficient representation.[66] A lien on the property and franchises of a railroad company will not be

§ 312. Actions on Bonds and Coupons

a. In general
b. Conditions precedent
c. Parties
d. Pleading and evidence

a. In General

The holder of unpaid bonds or interest coupons of a railroad company ordinarily may sue in assumpsit for the amount due thereon.

The holder of unpaid bonds or interest coupons of a railroad company ordinarily may sue in assumpsit for the amount due thereon,[68] notwithstanding a majority in interest of the holders of bonds of the same class have consented to waive their rights under the mortgage securing the bonds,[69] and such right to sue is not affected by remedies provided in the mortgage[70] unless the provisions of the mortgage or of a statute exclude it in express terms or by necessary implication.[71] A holder of unpaid coupons is not estopped to recover on them by mere delay after the making of an agreement by other holders to surrender their coupons on condition that the company use the funds otherwise applicable thereto for improving its road,[72] although he knew that the company was so applying such funds.[73]

The requirements of statutes as to process and notice to defendant must be met.[74] In at least one jurisdiction, in order to render a foreign railroad company amenable to personal service, it must be doing business in the state,[75] and it is not doing business in the state where its lines and properties are located outside the state and it merely maintains an advertising and information agency in the state.[76]

Enforcement of judgment. A judgment rendered in an action against a railroad company on a bond or interest coupon can be enforced only against property of the company not covered by the mortgage securing the bond.[77]

b. Conditions Precedent

A railroad company cannot take advantage of the nonperformance of conditions precedent prescribed by the bonds or by statute where the nonperformance is caused by its own wrong.

While conditions precedent to the right to bring action against a railroad company on its bonds or other obligations are sometimes prescribed thereby or by statute, the company cannot take advantage of a nonperformance of such conditions caused by its own wrong;[78] and it has been held that, where a condition is only for the benefit of the bondholders, a holder of nearly all of the bonds outstanding may bring an action without complying therewith.[79] The indenture may provide that a suit by bondholders cannot be brought unless the holders of a certain per cent of the bonds request the trustee to proceed,[80] and are thereby bound by the judgment of the trustee as to whether to resort to courts unless the specified per cent elect to request the trustee to proceed.[81] If the trustee acts in bad faith or declines to act at all, the bondholders are not bound by the restrictions in the indenture,[82] and may bring a derivative action in the right of the trustee.[83]

Trustee urging granting of relief

In minority bondholders' action to compel specific performance of covenants in railroad mortgage indenture, where complaint alleged that trustee had notified railroad that bondholders' committee had demanded that covenants be performed, and trustee in answer alleged that it refrained from demanding dismissal of complaint, pleadings as a whole showed compliance with provision of indenture requiring three months'

Demand. Except where required by the terms of a bond, the mortgage under which it was issued, or a statute,[84] a demand of payment is not a condition precedent to the right to bring action therefor.[85] Where a demand is required to be made on a particular officer of the company, a demand on any other officer is insufficient.[86]

c. Parties

Other creditors or obligees of the company are not necessary parties to an action on a bond or coupon of the railroad company.

Other creditors or obligees of the company are not necessary parties to an action on a bond or coupon of a railroad company,[87] but a creditor not made a party thereto is not bound by any determination therein as to the relative priorities of the respective claims.[88] An assignee of railroad bonds, to whom the bonds have not been delivered, is a proper party to an action on the bonds by the assignor,[89] but not a necessary one,[90] unless the debtor company has some legal defense against the assignee alone.[91]

Interveners. Persons who are not necessary parties may be entitled to intervene in the action,[92] provided, where the right to intervene is governed by statute, such claimants are authorized by the statute to avail themselves of the remedy.[93]

d. Pleading and Evidence

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, the rules relating to pleadings and evidence in other civil actions apply to actions on obligations of railroad companies.

Except as modified by special statute, the rules relating to pleadings in other civil actions apply to actions on obligations of railroad companies.[94] A petition in an action on a bond issued by a railroad company must set forth facts sufficient to show that the bond was issued for an authorized purpose,[95] but need not allege that the issuance of such bond was necessary.[96] The statement of a mere conclusion of the pleader is insufficient.[97] Where the cause of action is founded on an act of an officer of the company not within his ordinary authority, either express authority conferred by the board of directors to do the act, or ratification thereof, or estoppel to deny his authority, must be pleaded.[98] A petition of intervention must set forth all the facts necessary to show a right to the relief sought.[99] A demurrer to a petition claiming a preference should be overruled where any item on which the claim is founded is entitled to priority.[1]

Evidence and burden of proof. Immaterial and irrelevant evidence is inadmissible in actions against railroad companies on their bonds or other obligations.[2] Where a bond or other obligation is valid on its face, the burden of proving its invalidity is on one asserting it;[3] but where a statute requires the securities of railroad companies, with certain exceptions, to be approved by the railroad commission, the burden is on the company to show that it is one of the class excepted from the operation of the statute.[4] is to bring the company and its creditors into chancery where the funds and earnings of the road may be distributed equitably among the claimants.

Where a remedy by the levy of attachment or execution on the property of a railroad company is not available, the proper mode of enforcing payment of a claim is to bring the company and its creditors into chancery where the funds and earnings of the road may be distributed equitably among the claimants.[5] In such a proceeding a judgment creditor may subject the property of the company, or its interest therein, to the payment of his judgment.[6]

As a general rule a creditor at large or before judgment cannot proceed by a creditor's bill to reach assets of a railroad company, even if there is nothing liable to attachment or execution;[7] but, where a creditor is entitled to payment out of specific property or fund, a petition in the nature of a creditor's bill may be maintained without judgment first obtained,[8] and suit will lie to enjoin a diversion or misapplication of such fund or property.[9] In such a case a creditor may proceed for himself without making other creditors parties to his suit.[10] Where a holder of unpaid coupons which have accumulated by reason of a deficiency of the earnings applicable thereto sues in equity on some of the bonds for an accounting and afterward sues at law to recover on coupons attached to other bonds of the same issue, he is entitled to an accounting in the equity suit not merely for earnings prior to the commencement of such suit, but also for all earnings received thereafter until the accounts are stated,[11] and the law action on the coupons should be stayed as plaintiff's rights can be protected in the equity suit.[12]

B. FORECLOSURE OF LIENS AND MORTGAGES

§ 314. Right to Foreclose

a. In general
b. Default in payment of principal or interest

a. In General

The general rules applicable to the foreclosure of liens and mortgages regulate the right to foreclose a railroad lien or mortgage except to the extent that special statutes may govern.

Except in so far as it may be regulated by special statute,[13] the general rules applicable to the foreclosure of liens and mortgages govern the right to foreclose a railroad lien or a railroad mortgage.[14] Accordingly, in the absence of statutory restrictions, a mortgage or trust deed may be foreclosed on the failure of the railroad to pay at the maturity of the debt.[15] If the right to foreclose exists, the motive of the bondholder in purchasing the bonds and foreclosing is immaterial;[16] and, where a railroad mortgage is indivisible, there can be but one foreclosure.[17]

Moratorium statutes
(1) Statute imposing a moratorium on right to foreclose mortgage on real property was applicable to a trust indenture mortgage given by railroad corporation covering its realty, franchises, rents, profits, rolling stock and after-acquired property.—Delaware & Hudson Co. v. Utica, C. & B. R. Co., 21 N.Y.S.2d 410, 174 Misc. 403, affirmed 20 N.Y.S.2d 1012, 259 App.Div. 969, appeal granted 21 N.Y.S.2d 393, 259 App.Div. 986.

(2) An indebtedness of a railroad was "contracted for simultaneously with mortgage" within meaning of mortgage moratorium statute prohibiting during emergency actions on indebtedness if indebtedness originated or was originally contracted for simultaneously with the mortgage and is secured solely by the mortgage, where proceeds of mortgage bond issue were used to retire a previous bond issue, but mortgage did not secure former bonds.—Delaware & Hudson Co. v. Utica, C. & B. R. Co., supra.

17. Conn.—Gates v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 5 A. 695, 53 Conn. 333.

The prior foreclosure of a mortgage of railroad property securing railroad bonds also collaterally secured by trust deeds given by various parties is not a prerequisite to the foreclosure of such trust deeds, where it would be useless and nothing would be realized therefrom.[18]

b. Default in Payment of Principal or Interest

A mortgage given to secure the payment of railroad bonds and interest coupons ordinarily may be foreclosed immediately on default in the payment of any installment of principal or interest.

On the mortgagee's compliance with its provision,[19] in the absence of statutory restrictions, a mortgage given to secure the payment of railroad bonds and interest coupons ordinarily may be foreclosed immediately on default in the payment of any installment of principal or interest,[20] to the extent of the installments which are due and unpaid,[21] especially where, by the terms of the mortgage, proceedings for the collection of interest by ordinary judgment and execution at law are forbidden,[22] and although the mortgage fails to provide expressly therefor.[23] This right immediately to institute foreclosure proceedings for the payment of interest is not affected by provisions in the mortgage for cumulative remedies.[24] Where the railroad company is hopelessly insolvent, a railroad mortgage may sometimes be foreclosed before there has been any default.[25]

Where the mortgage provides that the principal shall become due for purposes of foreclosure on a default in interest continuing for a specified time, the trustee may, on the default continuing for such length of time, proceed to the collection of the whole amount of principal and interest by a bill in equity without a formal declaration of the maturity of such principal, unless the mortgage so requires.[26]

Acceleration. Where it is so provided in the mortgage, the entire debt may become due with a consequent right of foreclosure on default in the payment of interest,[27] although such right may be waived,[28] but, where the statute authorizing the issuance of the mortgages definitely prohibits maturity before a fixed time, an acceleration clause in the mortgage is void.[29]

§ 315. Persons Entitled to Foreclose

a. In general
b. Trustee under trust deed
c. Bondholders

a. In General

A railroad mortgage ordinarily may be foreclosed by the legal holder of the mortgage or by the actual creditor.

The right to proceed for the foreclosure of a railroad mortgage is ordinarily in the legal holder of the mortgage, the mortgagee,[30] or trustee, as discussed infra subdivision b of this section, or in the actual creditor, that is, the one who is the real and beneficial owner of the debt or obligation secured, and who is entitled to receive the money due.[31] A pledgee of railroad bonds has a sufficient beneficial interest to ask for a foreclosure of the mortgage,[32] regardless of the wishes of the nominal mortgagee.[33]

A guarantor of railroad mortgage bonds, who by the express terms of the mortgage, is to be subrogated to all the rights of the mortgagees in respect of payments made by him, has a right to foreclose for interest payments made by him,[34] and this right cannot be denied on the ground that, since he would still remain bound on his guarantee, he would have the right to further foreclosures for future payments.[35]

Mechanics' lien. The right to foreclose a mechanics' lien is in the holder of the legal title or beneficial interest.[36]

b. Trustee under Trust Deed

A trustee under a railroad mortgage ordinarily may institute foreclosure proceedings for a breach of conditions in the mortgage.

A trustee under a railroad mortgage is ordinarily the proper party to institute foreclosure proceedings for a breach of conditions in the mortgage,[37] and in making a foreclosure a large discretion is vested in him,[38] and any limitations on his power to institute foreclosure proceedings should be strictly construed.[39]

Since, as discussed infra § 321, the bondholders are not necessary parties to a foreclosure proceeding by a trustee, they cannot control the action of the trustee as long as he is not guilty of misconduct,[40] does not prove himself incompetent,[41] or does not appear to have an adverse interest.[42] A provision authorizing the trustee to refuse to institute foreclosure proceedings until properly indemnified does not restrict or limit his rights in the matter of instituting suit.[43]

Where a trustee's title has become divested, he has no right to represent the bondholders in foreclosure proceedings;[44] and if some of the trustees refuse to act, a foreclosure suit may be prosecuted by the remaining trustee or trustees,[45] and those refusing to act may be made defendants.[46]

Where one of several trustees dies, the surviving trustee or trustees may maintain the suit,[47] and, although a suit commenced by several trustees does not abate on the death of one, it must be postponed until the vacancy is filled.[48]

Request of bondholders. Frequently the mortgage or trust deed contains provisions making the trustees' right to foreclose dependent on a request by a specified number or percentage of the bondholders,[49] yet, where the mortgagor is permitted to remain in possession, the trustee's right of foreclosure for an unpaid installment of principal or interest is not affected by a further provision that, on default in the payment of interest for a specified time, it should be the duty of the trustee to enforce the rights of the bondholders on the request of a specified number or percentage of the bondholders, although such request has not been made,[50] since such request is necessary only where the trustee wishes to proceed to foreclose or take possession without the intervention of any court,[51] or where the bondholders wish to coerce the trustee to proceed by a foreclosure action.[52] So a provision authorizing a majority of the bondholders on default to notify the trustee to take no further steps to sell the property until another default refers merely to a summary sale by the trustee alone, and a suit to foreclose may be maintained notwithstanding the opposition of the majority.[53]

c. Bondholders

Proceedings to foreclose a railroad mortgage may be instituted by a bondholder for himself and others where the trustee unreasonably neglects or refuses to do so or where the trustees are dead.

Bondholders ordinarily may proceed against the mortgaged property of a railroad only through the trustee,[54] and a provision in a railroad mortgage that there shall be a request by a certain number or percentage of the bondholders to the trustee to institute the foreclosure proceedings before a bondholder may institute a foreclosure suit should be strictly complied with,[55] unless it appears that such compliance is impossible[56] or that the trustees' interests are antagonistic.[57]

Nevertheless, foreclosure proceedings may be instituted by a bondholder, or any other beneficiary, for himself and others where the trustee unreasonably neglects or refuses to do so,[58] or where the trustees are dead.[59] Such a bill should ordinarily be filed against the company by one or more of the bondholders on behalf of themselves and all other bondholders similarly situated;[60] but, in the absence of any provision in the mortgage to the contrary, the default may be taken advantage of by the holder of a single bond or coupon[61] without the consent of the others.[62] If there are several successive mortgages, and complainants hold bonds secured by each mortgage, the bill may be filed on behalf of themselves and all the bondholders under each mortgage.[63] Since, a power of sale given to a trustee is only a cumulative remedy, as considered infra § 317, it does not deprive the bondholders of the right to foreclose.[64] If complainants to a bill of foreclosure to which the trustee has been made defendant elect to dismiss the bill as to the trustee, the court has the discretion to allow the trustee to file a bill for the benefit of all the bondholders.[65]

Where a trustee has properly instituted a foreclosure suit, a bondholder cannot prosecute an independent suit of foreclosure, but can only be heard for his individual rights by coming into the trustee's pending suit,[66] and, where some of the bondholders do not wish to foreclose, they may be allowed to purchase the bonds of those desiring a foreclosure and pay all costs, and thereby stay the proceedings.[67]

§ 316. Foreclosure without Action

Where the statute creating a lien or mortgage on railroad property for public aid granted to the railroad so provides, on default or breach of the conditions under which the aid was granted the proper officers may enter and sell the road in the prescribed manner.

The foreclosure of a lien or mortgage on railroad property for public aid granted to the railroad is usually regulated by the statute under which such lien or mortgage is created.[68] Under such statutes it is usually provided that, on default or breach of the conditions under which the aid was granted, the proper officers may enter and sell the road in the prescribed manner,[69] although a court of equity may interfere to restrain a sale of the railroad property where a sale under the circumstances would be inequitable.[70] Under such statutes a sale cannot be made without preserving a lien on all the property and franchises sold for the purchase money, if it is not paid at the time of the sale.[71]

§ 317. —— By Exercise of Power of Sale

On breach of the conditions of a mortgage or deed of trust of railroad property the trustees may take possession of and sell the mortgaged property in the manner and on the terms prescribed by the mortgage or deed.

Where so provided in the mortgage or deed of trust of railroad property, the trustees may, when the conditions of the deed are broken, take possession of and sell the mortgaged property in the manner and on the terms prescribed by the deed, without a foreclosure before the courts;[72] and if they proceed to sell in the manner prescribed,[73] after compliance with any conditions in the deed,[74] the sale will divest the title of the railroad company.[75]

If a power of sale is to be executed by the trustee on certain contingencies, he may be controlled, restrained, and directed by a court of equity at the suit of parties standing in the relation of cestuis que trust, the rule for his guidance being derived from the instrument itself.[76]

Necessity of exercise of power. Where the trust deed authorizes a trustee either to sell at public auction or to proceed by suit to foreclose and to sell under the foreclosure decree, the trustee has discretion as to which method shall be used,[77] and such discretion is not subject to question by the bondholders[78] or to review by the court,[79] merely because another person might have exercised the discretion in a manner different from that adopted by the trustee. Foreclosure by the exercise of a power of sale is merely a cumulative remedy,[80] even though the mortgage or deed provides that a sale by the trustee shall be the exclusive method of foreclosure.[81]

A mortgage which authorizes the trustees to take possession for the purpose of operation and also authorizes them to sell the property, on default in payment of principal or interest, has been construed to permit the trustees to take possession and to refuse to sell,[82] or, after they have taken possession, to make a sale.[83]

In suits to foreclose a mortgage or lien on railroad property various defenses have been sustained, such as payment and the pendency of a prior suit.

In suits for foreclosure of mortgages and liens on railroad property various defenses have been urged.[84] It is a good defense to an action to foreclose a railroad mortgage that the defaulted bonds or coupons have been paid,[85] that a prior suit of foreclosure is pending,[86] or that, because control of the railroad was acquired by a competing road which was behind the foreclosure as a bondholder, the company has misapplied its earnings in order to bring about a default.[87]

On the other hand, it is not a good defense to an action to foreclose a mortgage that the value of the railroad stock is abnormally depressed by unusual financial conditions,[88] or by false reports and harassing suits by complainants,[89] and that there is good ground to anticipate a substantial enhancement of the value;[90] nor is it a defense that the foreclosure suit is actuated by improper motives,[91] as that complainants are bringing the suit in the interests of a rival company in order that it may purchase the railroad while the price is depressed,[92] or that complainant, a purchaser of bonds, purchased them from, and at the request of, the lessee of the mortgaged railroad and that he instituted foreclosure proceedings as a means of relieving the lessee from the inconvenience or loss arising from the operation of the road [93]

A defense may not be founded on rights arising between the mortgagor and a third person,[94] and a statutory remedy given to a state and affording a paramount lien for its indorsement of bonds cannot be set up as a defense by purchasers of the railroad in a contest between them and the holders of indorsed bonds secured also by the corporation's mortgage.[95] Neither a railroad company, its stockholders, nor a purchaser can deny the validity of the company's incorporation in a suit to foreclose a mortgage which it has executed,[96] but the invalidity of the mortgage may be set up as a defense by a purchaser of the railroad's property under an execution sale.[97]

In an action by an assignee, the mortgagor company may ordinarily set up the same defenses as would be available to it if the action was by the original holder,[98] and matters which are available as a defense in a foreclosure action may not be made the basis of a suit to enjoin such action.[99]

Counterclaim and set-off. As a general rule a claim or demand of the defendant against a complainant in a foreclosure suit cannot be set up by way of counterclaim or set-off.[1]

Estoppel to assert defense A defendant may be estopped to set up matters of defense which otherwise would be good.[2]

§ 319. Jurisdiction and Powers of the Court; Venue

A court of equity has jurisdiction to foreclose liens and mortgages on railroad property.

In the absence of special statute providing otherwise, the rules governing the jurisdiction and powers of courts in the foreclosure of liens and mortgages generally apply to actions for the foreclosure of liens and mortgages on railroad property.[3] A court of equity has jurisdiction to foreclose such liens or mortgages,[4] and it has power to decree a sale of the mortgaged railroad property on default in payment of interest, although the terms of the mortgage do not authorize such sale, and the bonds secured by the mortgage have not matured, if it appears that there is an urgent necessity for the sale.[5]

Where the property has been sold and transferred under a foreclosure decree, the court has no further jurisdiction in the suit to entertain a petition to enforce a claim against the property or to require the payment by the purchaser of any claim which has not been filed as required by the decree;[6] but where the court has reserved jurisdiction in the decree, it has power to render its decree effective by determining disputes between persons whose rights are dependent on matters fixed in the decree.[7]

cretion, foreclose a mortgage on railroad property, although embracing lands in another state, and may direct a sale thereof, and the execution of a proper conveyance to the purchaser,[8] subject to any liens existing against the property in the other state.[9] However, it has been held that, where a road in one state is consolidated with a road in another state on which a mortgage existed, although the mortgagee can maintain an action in the courts of the state in which the mortgaged road is situated, and have a sale of the road within the limits of such state, no jurisdiction exists in the courts of the former state to foreclose such mortgage.[10]

Conflict of jurisdiction. General rules as to conflict of jurisdiction between courts ordinarily apply in suits or actions to foreclose a railroad mortgage or lien.[11] The pendency in a state court of a suit to foreclose a railroad mortgage is not a bar to a similar suit in a federal court;[12] and similarly, the fact that a receiver has been appointed over the railroad property by a state court will not prevent the institution of foreclosure proceedings in a federal court,[13] although the latter court will not go so far as to interfere in any way with the receiver's possession of the property.[14]

Where the circuit court sitting in one state has assumed jurisdiction of a foreclosure of a mortgage covering a railroad partly in that state and partly in another, the fact that the circuit court for the state wherein the remaining portion of the line is situated entertains a similar bill will not oust the former of jurisdiction.[15] A procedure sometimes followed in foreclosing on a road running through more than one state is the filing of a bill to foreclose in one state supplemented by ancillary suits instituted in the other states through which the road runs.[16]

Venue. In some jurisdictions special statutes have prescribed the venue for actions to foreclose a lien or mortgage on railroad property,[17] such as statutes fixing the venue of actions by subcontractors and laborers to foreclose a lien in the court of the county or district where the work was done.[18]

§ 321. Parties

a. In general
b. Foreclosure of liens for labor, supplies, etc
c. Interveners and new parties

a. In General

In proceedings to foreclose a mortgage on railroad property the general rules governing parties to civil actions and, particularly, the rules regulating parties in suits to foreclose mortgages ordinarily apply.

General rules relating to parties to civil actions, and especially the rules governing parties in suits to foreclose mortgages, usually are applicable to proceedings to foreclose a mortgage on railroad property.[24] Accordingly, as a general rule all persons interested in the proceedings for the foreclosure of a railroad mortgage should be made parties.[25] There are exceptions to this rule, particularly in foreclosure proceedings in federal courts,[26] and ordinarily it is enough that sufficient parties to represent all the adverse interests of plaintiffs and defendants are brought before the court,[27] nevertheless, where the mortgage is executed directly to all the bondholders, they must all be joined as parties.[28]

In a suit by bondholders or others for the foreclosure of a railroad mortgage, the trustees of the mortgage bondholders should be made parties,[29] except that, under certain circumstances, a court may proceed to determine the issues between parties who are properly before it without the trustee being made a party.[30]

The doctrine also seems to be well settled that a trustee in a mortgage or trust deed speaks and acts for the bondholders and other beneficiaries, and that the latter are neither necessary nor proper parties unless the fitness of the particular trustee or his conduct as such in failing efficiently, honestly, or impartially to discharge his duty is brought in question,[31] particularly where the bondholders are numerous.[32] They may be admitted as parties, however, where the trustee is guilty of misconduct or shows himself incompetent properly to execute the trust or where he is shown to have interests adverse to those of the bondholders.[33]

It may be stated as a general proposition that the only proper parties to a bill to foreclose a railroad mortgage are the mortgagor, the mortgagee, and those who acquired rights under them subsequent to the mortgage.[34] Accordingly, proper but not necessary parties to a suit of foreclosure are the owner of the equity of redemption,[35] a lessee in within which an owner of live stock previously killed by the railroad must bring action to enforce his lien under statute, even though a modified procedure by intervention in the receivership proceedings would be sufficient compliance with the statute.—Birmingham Trust, etc, Co. v. possession of the mortgaged premises,[36] junior encumbrancers,[37] and others who are so connected with the subject matter that their presence before the court cannot be objected to as a misjoinder, although a full and complete decree could be made without regard to their rights.[38] On the other hand, one claiming a title adverse and superior to that of the mortgagor is not a proper party.[39]

A general creditor is neither a necessary nor a proper party to such a suit,[40] nor is a receiver, in a creditor's suit, operating the railroad.[41] In an action to foreclose a mortgage on the property of a consolidated railroad, the trustee and bondholders under a mortgage issued by a constituent company prior to the consolidation are neither necessary nor proper parties where the constituent railroad remained in existence for the purpose of discharging its mortgage.[42]

Neither the state nor the holders of state bonds issued in aid of a railroad company and guaranteed by the company, under a statute which does not make the bonds a lien on the road, are necessary parties to a foreclosure of a mortgage on the railroad;[43] nor is a state which is an indorser of bonds secured by a statutory mortgage a necessary party to a suit brought by the holders of the bonds to foreclose the mortgage.[44] Where at the time of commencement of the foreclosure suit an action is pending on behalf of the people to dissolve the railroad company on the ground of insolvency, neither a temporary receiver appointed in that action nor the people are necessary parties to the foreclosure suit,[45] although the court has power in its discretion to allow the people or the receiver to intervene therein.[46]

Foreclosure of one of several mortgages. Where separate mortgages are given on distinct portions of a road at different times to secure the debts of separate creditors, one mortgagee is not a necessary party to a suit which another mortgagee may bring to foreclose his mortgage;[47] and, where it appears that the making of a subsequent mortgagee a party to the foreclosure suit hinders and delays the suit, the bill should be dismissed as to him.[48]

b. Foreclosure of Liens for Labor, Supplies, Etc.

The general rules governing parties in proceedings to foreclose mechanics' liens ordinarily are applicable to proceedings to enforce a lien for work and labor or material furnished to a railroad.

In the absence of a special statutory provision otherwise, the general rules governing parties to a foreclosure of mechanics' liens ordinarily are applicable in a proceeding to enforce a lien for work and labor or material furnished against railroad property.[49] Thus, in such an action the owner of the road is generally a necessary party defendant,[50] although it is not necessary that all the companies interested in the railroad be made parties to the proceedings.[51]

Contractor and subcontractor. It seems to be the well settled rule that, in an action for material and labor furnished under a contract with a contractor or subcontractor, such contractor or subcontractor is a proper party defendant.[52] In some jurisdictions he is held not to be a necessary party,[53] while in others such person must be brought in as a party,[54] except where the contractor's liability to the lienor has been judicially determined by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction.[55] mechanic's lien based on the claim that the contractor has been fully paid in advance by the terms of his contract, the owner, although admitting that he has paid the contractor and accepted the work when finished, may make the contractor and an assignee of the contractor parties to the suit.[56] It has also been held that the contractor is at least a proper,[57] and perhaps a necessary,[58] party to an action to enforce a lien for a debt owed by a subcontractor; and in an action by an assignee to enforce such a lien for labor performed for a subcontractor both the contractor and the subcontractor are necessary parties.[59] Nevertheless, even though the principal contractor is a necessary party, failure to take timely objection to his omission is a waiver of the defect.[60]

c. Interveners and New Parties

In actions to foreclose railroad liens and mortgages the general rules governing the intervention of parties in actions to foreclose mechanics' liens and mortgages ordinarily are applicable.

The general rules governing the intervention of parties in actions to foreclose mechanics' liens and mortgages ordinarily are applicable to actions to foreclose railroad liens and mortgages.[61] As a general rule, any person having such an interest in, or lien on, the mortgaged premises and in the debt secured that his rights might be compromised by a decree in his absence can be allowed to intervene or be made a new party in the foreclosure, on his own petition[62] or by a supplemental bill,[63] except where he has an adequate remedy at law by an independent suit.[64] This rule may be applied in favor of interventions by individual bondholders seeking to be heard in an action by the mortgagee, trustee, or other bondholders who are not properly protecting their interests,[65] or in favor of the representatives of such bondholders,[66] or of purchasers at the foreclosure sale.[67]

On the other hand, claimants will not be allowed to intervene after a long delay when the whole case is about to be closed,[68] unless they offer to become responsible for what has occurred or what might occur from the delay thereafter,[69] and if claimant having a right of intervention neglects or refuses to come in and entitle himself to the benefit of a decree, equity will not assist him to set aside and annul it.[70]

It is within the discretion of the court[71] to refuse to allow claimants to intervene in respect of matters which are foreign to the litigation in the foreclosure suit,[72] and where the controversy of intervention is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, claimant will not be permitted to intervene.[73]

A railroad stockholder will not be allowed to intervene in a foreclosure suit unless he charges fraud or collusion between plaintiffs and defendant company.[74] Where the state is in some way interested in the subject matter of the suit, it may properly be permitted to intervene.[75]

§ 322. Process and Appearance

A decree in a suit for the foreclosure of a lien or mortgage on railroad property is not binding on parties whose presence is essential unless such parties voluntarily appear or are served with process or notice.

In accordance with the rules governing process and notice or appearance in foreclosure suits generally, in order that a decree in a suit for the foreclosure of a lien or mortgage on railroad property may be binding on parties whose presence is essential thereto, it is necessary that such parties voluntarily appear or be served with process or notice.[76] In a foreclosure suit by junior mortgagees, senior mortgagees can be made parties only by service of process or voluntary appearance,[77] and a general notice calling on them to present their claims is not sufficient,[78] except where they are represented by trustees who are actual parties to the suit, in which case a notice calling on them to present their claims before the master will be effectual.[79]

§ 323. Pleading

a. In general
b. Enforcement of lien for labor, supplies, etc.
c. Plea, answer, and subsequent pleadings
d. Issues, proof, and variance

a. In General

The general rules of pleading in civil actions ordinarily are applicable in suits to foreclose a railroad mortgage.

General rules of pleading in civil actions, and especially the rules of pleading in actions to foreclose mortgages, ordinarily are applicable in suits to foreclose a railroad mortgage.[80] The allegations of a declaration, bill, or complaint in a suit in equity to foreclose a railroad mortgage should be distinct and specific.[81] Generally the bill should contain a proper statement of all the facts essential to complainant's cause of action, and sufficient to connect defendant or defendants with the liability asserted under the mortgage, and an appropriate prayer for relief.[82] It should allege facts showing complainant's ownership of the debt and the right to maintain the action,[83] and the default relied on as the basis of the suit.[84]

A bill in equity by bondholders seeking to foreclose a railroad mortgage, and also to recover bonds claimed by some of plaintiffs and alleged to be wrongfully held by one of the defendants, is not bad for multifariousness.[85]

b. Enforcement of Lien for Labor, Supplies, Etc.

The general rules of pleading in civil actions ordinarily apply in actions to foreclose a lien for labor and work or materials furnished to a railroad company.

General rules of pleading in civil actions and the rules of pleading in suits to enforce mechanics' liens usually apply in proceedings to foreclose a lien for labor and work or materials furnished to a railroad company.[86] Accordingly, the complaint or petition should conform to the requirements of the statute, and should allege all the facts on which such lien arises and which authorize its enforcement under the statute.[87] In the absence of an attachment, the bill must describe the property on which it is sought to enforce the lien with sufficient definiteness to identify and segregate it;[88] it must also set forth that the services or materials furnished were used in or on the road against which the lien is sought.[89]

A petition which sets up under one recorded lien claims for amounts due under separate contracts relating to the same undertaking, as to each of which liens are authorized, is not demurrable, where there is also declared the part of the work done under each contract;[90] but a petition in which several subcontractors, having separate and distinct claims, join to enforce their liens is bad as multifarious,[91] which defect is waived by an answer on the merits.[92]

In those jurisdictions in which subcontractors do not come within the lien statutes, a complaint which fails to show any privity of contract between the subcontractor and the railroad company,[93] or that the company is indebted to the contractor, who is not made a party to the proceeding,[94] is demurrable. On the other hand, where a lien claim cannot be assigned before perfection of the lien, a petition showing on its face that the assignment was made before the lien was so perfected is demurrable.[95]

c. Plea, Answer, and Subsequent Pleadings

The answer, plea, or subsequent pleading to a bill to foreclose a railroad mortgage or to enforce a railroad lien ordinarily is governed by the general rules of pleading in civil actions and by the rules governing pleas, answers, and subsequent pleadings in suits to foreclose mortgages and liens generally.

The answer, plea, or subsequent pleading to a bill to foreclose a railroad mortgage or enforce a railroad lien ordinarily is regulated by the general rules of pleading in civil actions and the rules governing pleas, answers, and subsequent pleadings in suits to foreclose mortgages or liens generally.[96] Accordingly, the plea or answer must be responsive to the bill or complaint and controvert all its material allegations.[97] Matters operating to defeat the right of foreclosure may be set up in the pleading,[98] but allegations foreign to matters set forth in the complaint may not be set up in the answer.[99] The answer must be filed within the proper time,[1] although leave to interpose an answer after a delay may be granted in a proper case.[2]

Where one entitled to a statutory lien on the property of an insolvent railroad company intervenes in a suit to foreclose a mortgage on such property for the purpose of having his claim decreed priority over the mortgage debts, since the original suit and the relief claimed by the intervener are both equitable, a plea of an adequate remedy at law is not necessary to entitle defendants to avail themselves of that defense.[3]

Cross bill. Where a bill of foreclosure is filed by one who has no title in the mortgage, there can be no foreclosure unless the trustee in the mortgage files a cross bill for that purpose.[4]

Amendments. The general rules governing the amendments of pleadings in equitable actions, ordinarily apply in actions to foreclose railroad liens and mortgages.[5]

d. Issues, Proof, and Variance

The general rules as to issues, proof, and variance in civil actions ordinarily apply in actions to foreclose railroad mortgages and liens.

The rules as to issues, proof, and variance applicable in civil actions generally, and particularly in actions to foreclose mortgages or mechanics' liens, ordinarily are applicable in actions to foreclose railroad mortgages or liens.[6] Accordingly, only such matters as are properly in the case[7] and concern the parties thereto[8] need or may be proved. Questions as to the amounts and validity of the bonds secured will be determined on the hearing,[9] but in a foreclosure suit a question as to an adverse title to part of the mortgaged premises pending between the receiver of the railroad and a third person cannot be litigated,[10] nor can an issue as to the identity of the bondholder be raised where the right of the trustee to foreclose the mortgage is not dependent on a request of the bondholders.[11] The question of ownership of the bonds secured cannot properly be raised in the foreclosure suit, since such question properly comes up for consideration on the distribution of the proceeds.[12]

The petition in a proceeding to enforce a mechanics' lien should substantially agree with the statements contained in the lien which has been filed,[13] except that, where the statutes do not require any statement to be filed, a variance between the petition and the statement is immaterial.[14]

§ 324. Evidence

In suits to foreclose a lien or mortgage on railroad property the general rules of evidence in civil actions ordinarily are applicable.

General rules of evidence in civil actions and the rules of evidence governing suits to foreclose mortgages and mechanics' liens ordinarily apply in a suit to foreclose a lien or mortgage on railroad property[15] with respect to presumptions and burden of proof,[16] and the admissibility[17] and weight and sufficiency[18] of the evidence.

§ 325. Trial or Hearing, and Reference

The general rules governing the trial or hearing of civil actions ordinarily are applicable in actions to foreclose mortgages and liens on railroad property.

General rules relating to trial or hearing in civil actions, and the rules applicable to foreclose mortgages and mechanics' liens, ordinarily govern the trial or hearing of a foreclosure suit against a railroad company.[19] Such rules ordinarily control with respect to instructions[20] and the verdict or findings.[21]

Reference. The question as to the amount due on the lien or mortgage may be referred to a master or referee to find and report on, and exceptions may then be filed to his report and a decree made on the hearing and determination of such exceptions.[22] A reference may also be had to consider the ownership and validity of bonds[23] or to ascertain and fix the priorities of the various encumbrances on the railroad property.[24] Where a reference is made to ascertain the gross earnings and expenses of a certain section of the road covered by a mortgage, and it appears that such section has not been operated separately, but as a part of the whole road, and that the railroad company, although under a legal obligation to keep a separate account of the income and expenses of such section, has failed to do so, it is not an erroneous principle for the master to make a pro rata estimate of the earnings and expenses of the whole road.[25]

a. In General

The judgment or decree in a suit to foreclose a railroad mortgage or lien ordinarily is governed by the rules regulating judgments or decrees in suits to foreclose a mortgage or mechanic's lien.

The rules applicable to judgments or decrees in suits to foreclose a mortgage or mechanic's lien ordinarily govern the judgment or decree in a foreclosure suit of a railroad mortgage or lien.[26] The judgment or decree should declare the fact, nature, and extent of the default which constitutes the breach of the condition of the mortgage[27] and the amount then due;[28] but it need not establish that a particular installment is due to any particular person.[29] The amount of the debt for which a foreclosure decree may be given is only the amount actually due and unpaid to complainant.[30] Such decree is not to be regarded as final as to the debts entitled to share in the distribution, since any other creditor may challenge the debts when the claims are produced in the master's office for ascertainment and classification.[31]

Order of sale In its usual form, a decree of foreclosure should contain an order for the sale of the premises for the satisfaction of the debt,[32] reserving the right to any party to redeem on paying the several amounts found due with costs.[33] In decreeing a sale the court is not bound by a mode of procedure prescribed by the mortgage in case of a sale by the trustee without foreclosure, but should exercise a sound discretion, having due regard to the interests of all parties.[34]

It has been held that, where railroad property is worth much more than the amount of the debt and interest, it should be leased by public auction for the shortest term that will bring the amount due and accruing interest,[35] if the company elects that it shall be so offered,[36] but if no one can be found who will take it for a term of years, it should be sold absolutely.[37]

Personal judgment. Since the proceeding to foreclose is in rem, generally no personal judgment can be rendered in an action to foreclose a mortgage or mechanics' lien against railroad property,[38] and in some jurisdictions statutes have been enacted expressly prohibiting the rendition of personal judgments except under specified conditions.[39] However, it has been held that, where that part of a right of way on which labor was performed was a part of an entire system of a railroad and necessary for the carrying out of the railroad duties to the public so that it could not be sold apart from the entire line to foreclose a laborer's or materialman's lien, it was proper for the court in the exercise of its equity powers to direct a personal judgment against the railroad company.[40]

b. Conformity to Pleadings and Proof

A judgment or decree in a foreclosure suit against railroad property must conform to the pleadings and proof.

A judgment or decree in a foreclosure suit against railroad property must conform to the pleadings and proof.[41] Accordingly, the relief granted in the decree is limited by the bill or complaint, and ordinarily any relief not prayed for cannot be granted,[42] although a prayer for general relief will authorize any action in complainant's favor, shown by the proofs to be just and equitable and not inconsistent with the pleadings;[43] and, although the specific relief sought is a strict foreclosure, a decree for a sale of the property and for the enforcement of an agreement contained in the mortgage is appropriate under a prayer for general relief.[44]

Where all the claims are before the court with prayers for general affirmative relief, it may decree a sale of the property free from all liens,[45] but, where all the persons in interest are not represented before the court, a decree which directs a sale free of all liens and encumbrances without making provision for other bondholders, subsequent mortgagees, and other creditors is fatally defective.[46]

c. Nature and Extent of Property

In an action to foreclose a mortgage on railroad property the court may determine what property of the railroad is actually subject to the mortgage.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage on railroad property it is within the province of the court to determine what property of the railroad is actually embraced in, or subject to, the mortgage.[47] The foreclosure decree ordinarily can order a sale only of the entire road, as discussed infra § 327 d, and a judgment or decree which attempts to foreclose a lien or mortgage on a specified portion of the road instead of on the whole road is void,[48] except, as considered infra § 327 d, where the property is divisible, in which case a sale should be ordered of as much as will satisfy the amount due. Lands which are not included in the railroad mortgage may be sold under a decree of foreclosure, where the facts shown establish an equitable lien in favor of bondholders secured by the mortgage.[49]

A judgment foreclosing a laborer's lien on the equipment of a railroad need not specify the particular articles on which it is to operate, but it is sufficient to declare the lien foreclosed on the equipment to an extent sufficient to satisfy the judgment;[50] but it has been held that, where a mechanics' lien attaches to all the property of the railroad, the decree should direct the sale of both the real and personal property of the railroad.[51]

Where a railroad company, with the consent of a vendee, has constructed its road over land, and in an action to foreclose the vendor's lien the proceeds of the land outside of the right of way are insufficient to satisfy the lien, the right of way with the improvements thereon should not be sold to satisfy the lien for the balance, but should be condemned, the value thereof being ascertained by taking the value of the land and damages to the rest of the tract caused by the taking, and a judgment with a lien on the roadbed to secure its payment entered against the company for the amount so ascertained.[52]

d. Provisions as to Bids and Terms of Sale

In an action to foreclose a mortgage or lien on railroad property the decree should prescribe the terms and conditions of the sale.

The decree in an action to foreclose a mortgage or lien on railroad property should prescribe the terms and conditions of the sale, and, in the case of a mortgage, these terms may, if equity requires it, be different from the terms stipulated in the mortgage itself.[53] Although the terms of the sale must be reasonable[54] and of such character as to encourage bidding,[55] nevertheless the decree should contain some requirement which will evidence the bona fides of the bidder,[56] as well as secure the payment of the costs.[57]

The decree may prescribe that part of the bid shall be for cash,[58] or that a part may be paid in bonds secured by the foreclosed mortgage,[59] and that the sale shall be made subject to certain outstanding obligations;[60] or, on a subsequent presentation of intervening claims, the court may require as a condition precedent to the confirmation of the sale that the purchaser shall make a larger cash payment to meet all exigencies than that fixed by the terms of the decree.[61] As part of the terms, the purchaser may be required to assume the unpaid claims against the railroad.[62]

The court may, in its discretion,[63] fix an upset or minimum price below which the property may not be sold.[64] The amount of the upset price lies in the discretion of the court.[65] It should not be made too low[66] The upset price to be fixed must afford fair treatment to nonassenting bondholders having due regard to the probable fair value of the property reasonably ascertained.[67] On the other hand, the upset price should not be fixed at a figure so high that it will seriously impair the success of a reorganization which has been determined on to be necessary in the public interest and to be fair and equitable and desired by a large proportion of all of the affected bondholders.[68] It is no objection to a decree that it fails to fix such a minimum sale price, since the adequacy of any price may still be determined on the return of the sale.[69]

e. Adjudication of Claims of Interveners or Other Creditors

When warranted by the pleadings and proof, it is proper for the decree foreclosing a railroad mortgage or lien to settle and determine all claims and questions raised between the parties to the suit.

In an action to foreclose a railroad mortgage or lien, it is proper for the foreclosure decree, when warranted by the pleadings and proof, to settle and determine all claims and questions raised between the parties to the suit,[70] as to the ownership of the debt, the liability for, or exoneration from, it,[71] the proportion in which it should be shared,[72] or of its priority or preference,[73] and it may provide for

Factors to be considered

In determining upset prices for sale of properties of railroad in equitable reorganization, court was not limited to opinions of valuation experts who testified for assenting creditors and could consider in support of higher upset prices, recent experience of railroad, its present and future prospects based on evidence of steadily increasing market price of new securities and continuation of comparatively large net earnings, improved physical condition of equipment during receivership, favorable cash position of receivership, as discounted by post war prospects, increased wages, and taxes —Guaranty Trust Co. of N Y. v. an accounting between the parties.[74] However, the decree should save and reserve any rights arising under a hostile and paramount title.[75] The court may pass a final decree as to the ascertained debts and retain the bill for the enforcement of others thereafter to be proved and established.[76]

Where the decree makes adequate provision for the protection of intervening bondholders,[77] the court is not required to determine in advance of the sale the fairness of a reorganization plan[78] or the adequacy of any bid.[79]

f. Payment and Discharge

Provision should be made in the decree foreclosing a railroad mortgage for the payment within a limited time of the amount found due, in default of which the equity of redemption is to be finally foreclosed or the property sold

The decree in a suit to foreclose a railroad mortgage should contain provision for the payment of the amount found due within a limited time, in default of which the equity of redemption is to be finally foreclosed or the property sold,[80] the extent of such time being a matter for the sound discretion of the court.[81] Where only a part of the mortgage debt is due, on payment of such amount the foreclosure decree will be suspended until a default again occurs.[82]

Where the amount due has been passed on and finally fixed by the court and the right of the mortgagor to pay the sum thus settled and fixed is clear, the court then has no discretion to withhold such restoration and refuse to discharge the receiver.[83]

g. Opening, Vacating, or Modifying

A final decree foreclosing a railroad mortgage or lien ordinarily may not be vacated by the court of its own motion after the expiration of the term at which it was granted.

A final decree foreclosing a railroad mortgage or lien ordinarily cannot be vacated by the court of its own motion after the expiration of the term at which it was granted;[84] nor may the court alter or amend its decree after the term with respect to any essential part thereof.[85] Subject to the foregoing, it may subsequently amend, modify, or open the decree of sale as to the mode of its execution,[86] the manner of sale,[87] the time of publication of such sale,[88] and the manner of distributing the proceeds arising therefrom,[89] provided the application therefor is seasonably made,[90] and sufficient ground therefor appears[91]

Where a decree of sale prescribes a limitation within which claims may be presented, the court may, in its discretion, in decreeing a confirmation of the sale, abrogate such limitation.[92]

Public utilities commission, believing its jurisdiction was usurped by the court in a foreclosure proceeding, has a right to appear and ask for a modification or vacation of the decree.[96]

h. Operation and Effect

(1) In general
(2) Persons concluded

(1) In General

The general rules governing the operation and effect of judgments and decrees foreclosing liens and mortgages ordinarily are applicable to judgments and decrees foreclosing railroad liens and mortgages.

The general rules governing the operation and effect of judgments and decrees foreclosing liens and mortgages ordinarily apply to judgments and decrees foreclosing liens and mortgages on railroad property.[97] Thus, a decree of foreclosure and sale is a final decree, although further directions may be necessary with respect to its execution,[98] or although it may permit the subsequent assertion and litigation of claims on the proceeds of sale.[99] However, the decree does not of itself merge the debt secured by the mortgage or extinguish its lien.[1]

A foreclosure decree may not be collaterally attacked by a purchaser thereunder in subsequent proceedings against him.[2]

(2) Persons Concluded

All persons properly represented before the court in a proceeding foreclosing a mortgage or lien on railroad property, or who are charged with notice of the proceeding, are bound and concluded by the decree rendered therein.

All persons properly represented before the court in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage or lien on railroad property, whether as plaintiffs or defendants, or who are charged with notice of such proceeding, are bound and concluded by the decree rendered therein and estopped to dispute the validity of the proceedings or the title of the purchaser.[3] This rule includes persons acquiring interests in the mortgaged premises pending the foreclosure proceedings.[4] A judgment or decree in a foreclosure suit fairly brought and honestly and regularly conducted by a bondholder for the benefit of all the bondholders is conclusive and binding on all the parties represented therein,[5] but, if such suit is not conducted in good faith and is used as an instrument to acquire advantages for plaintiff at the expense of those whom he has assumed to protect, the latter will not be bound thereby.[6] If the trustees of a mortgage on a railroad are parties to the suit, a decree rendered in the case is as binding on the bondholders secured by it, as if they had been made parties, unless they can show some fraud practised on, or connived at, by the trustees themselves.[7]

On the other hand, persons having an interest in, or liens on, the road who are not joined as parties in a foreclosure suit are not bound or in any way affected by the decree therein unless they consent thereto.[8] A party who has intervened in a foreclosure suit to which there are several parties defendant will not, on the rendering of a decree and the dismissal of all the parties save one from whom the intervener claims relief, lose his standing in the action.[9] An action by a bondholder to enforce an equitable lien in his own behalf, as well as in behalf of those in like interest who may come in and contribute to the expenses of, and join in, the prosecution of the suit, is binding only on those who are made or become parties to the suit and bear their proportion of the expenses;[10] and a suit brought by an individual bondholder in which no relief is sought

i. Operation and effect

a. In General

Foreclosure sales of railroad property ordinarily are governed by the rules regulating foreclosure sales generally.

The general rules regulating foreclosure sales ordinarily apply to foreclosure sales of railroad property.[12] Thus, a sale must be supported by and within the limits and conditions prescribed by the decree ordering the sale to be made,[13] and, if the officer or master or commissioner in making the sale wrongfully interprets the order of the court, the sale is invalid,[14] even though the court has confirmed the record of the sale, but without its attention being directed to the mistake, or any issue being raised as to what the order really meant.[15]

Public or private sale. As a general rule the sale should be at public auction,[16] but, where the court is fully informed as to the selling value of the property, it may authorize a private sale.[17]

b. Notice and Appraisement

Notice of the foreclosure sale of railroad property must be given where such notice is required by statute or by the decree of foreclosure.

Due notice of the foreclosure sale of railroad property must be given in accordance with the provisions of the decree or statute governing such sales,[18] such as that notice shall be published in certain newspapers,[19] and shall definitely describe the property to be sold;[20] and in the case of a resale after failure of a purchaser to carry out the purchase notice must be given in the same manner.[21] It has been held that the description should be so definite that purchasers may know what they are purchasing.[22]

Appraisement. It is necessary under some statutes that the property shall be appraised in order to determine its actual value as a preliminary to the sale,[23] but a statute requiring an appraisement of the property before sale under powers contained in mortgage and trust deeds does not necessarily apply to a sale under a decree of foreclosure.[24]

c. Time for Sale; Postponement

A foreclosure sale of railroad property is to be held at such time as is fixed by statute, or, in the absence of statutory regulations, at such time as the court, in its discretion, shall designate.

Inverse order of alienation
In suit to foreclose railroad mortgages, if stock in another corporation was not covered by mortgage, but was covered by another mortgage, doctrine of resort to property in inverse order of alienation could not be applied in connection with the other mortgage, where neither the stock, the owner of equity in the stock, nor the trustee under the other mortgage were within jurisdiction of court, and no default had been made on such other mortgage.—Palmer v. Bankers' Trust Co., C.C.A. Colo., 12 F.2d 747.

Deposit of proceeds of sale
Where trustee under deed of trust of stock, in receiving by way of deposit the proceeds of sale, acted as representative of court, and not in his capacity as trustee for the beneficiaries under the trust deed, his liability was to account to that court, and it should be applied to for relief —Meisel v. Central Trust Co. of New York, 167 N.Y.S. 143, 179 App.Div. 795, affirmed 119 N.E. 1059, 223 N.Y. 589.

24. Ark.—Southwestern Arkansas, etc., R. Co. v. Hays, 88 S.W. 665, 63 Ark. 355.

Plaintiffs in a foreclosure proceeding of railroad property are entitled to have the date of sale fixed after such sale has been decreed.[25] Under some statutes a sale cannot be ordered until after the expiration of a specified time after the decree of foreclosure.[26] In the absence of statutory regulations, the proper time for the sale is within the discretion of the court.[27] Where the rights of the parties have not been established, a sale ordinarily cannot be ordered without the consent of all the parties,[28] or until the rights of the various parties are fully ascertained and determined,[29] and in order to justify such a decree the amount due on the debt should be determined judicially.[30] An immediate sale should not be ordered where there is a reasonable prospect of payment by a faithful application of the profits of the road.[31]

On the other hand, where it is to the interest of all the parties concerned and the existing conditions otherwise require it, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, may order an immediate sale,[32] although all conflicting rights have not been adjudicated,[33] and even pending foreclosure proceedings,[34] or before the determination of the amount and validity of the bonds held.[35] Thus, if the rights of all the parties can be protected,[36] an immediate sale should be decreed where the indebtedness will continue to accumulate during the period of litigation,[37] or the amount of claims depends on a long course of litigation,[38] or where a continued operation by the receivers appears to be undesirable.[39]

Postponement. The court has power to order a postponement of the sale on petition of the parties in interest,[40] and should do so where any good cause is shown,[41] as where a sale on the day originally appointed would be unfair or oppressive or would result in material loss.[42]

Where the relative priorities of the various classes of creditors entitled to participate in the proceeds of the sale are ascertained, and the conditions are such that an early sale is indispensable, the sale will not be postponed until the interests of the individual creditors have been adjusted and the class to which their demands belong has been ascertained;[43] nor will a sale be postponed merely because a road is more prosperous than for some time past, where it would take some years of such prosperity to pay the already overdue installments.[44] It has been held that postponement will not be granted to allow time for the purpose of searching the title,[45] ascertaining the liens,[46] cataloging the property,[47] or forming a new corporation.[48] It is too late two days before the date fixed for the sale to ask for its postponement without a tender of the debt[49] or an equivalent to such tender.[50]

d. Nature and Extent of Property Included in Sale

On a foreclosure sale of railroad property, only such property may be sold as is authorized by the decree and a sale under a decree of sale of the road ordinarily must be as an entirety.

A foreclosure sale of railroad property includes only the property which the decree ordered to be sold together with the accompanying rights and franchises necessary to its profitable use, and lawfully included in the mortgage and sale,[51] and a sale of more property than is authorized by the decree to be sold is invalid.[52]

Sale of parcels or in gross. As a general rule the railroad cannot be cut into fragments and separate portions sold at different sales, but a sale under a decree of sale of the road and all property rights and franchises must be as an entirety,[53] with a division of the proceeds,[54] although the road runs through several counties or states.[55] This is because the public interest in having the railroad continue its operation without interruption demands that the road be not sold piecemeal.[56]

Where, however, the property is susceptible of division, the court may order it to be sold separately;[57] if for the benefit of creditors,[58] a road may be offered for sale in its entirety with an alternate offer by parcels.[59] The road is to be sold as an entirety, even where it is covered by divisional mortgages, unless it is shown to be more advantageous to sell it by divisions.[60]

The court may order a sale and division of the proceeds of a central power house,[61] or of the entire rolling stock where it cannot be equitably divided,[62] and on a division sale it is proper, where other lienholders and creditors are protected, to sell, with one of the constituent parcels, equipment used for the operation of that parcel, although it was not subject to the mortgage lien.[63]

In the separation of a railroad into parcels, a court of equity is not bound to fix the division to correspond with the several mortgage grants,[64] but the division should be made so as to leave each parcel, as nearly as may be, in a situation to be operated as railroad.[65]

e. Price and Terms of Sale

In the foreclosure of a mortgage on railroad property, a wide discretion may be exercised as to the details and terms of sale.

In the absence of statutory restrictions, a wide discretion as to the details and terms of sale in view of the nature of the property may be exercised in the foreclosure of a mortgage of all the real estate, fixtures, and franchise right of operation of a railroad.[66] The officer making the sale ordinarily has no authority to sell on credit, particularly where the decree directs a sale for cash,[67] and cannot, therefore, accept preferred stock as such payment.[68]

A conditional bid which does not comply with the decree and order of sale is properly ignored.[69]

69. U.S.—Trustees Corp. v. Kansas

Under certain circumstances, as where the railroad is not paying operating expenses and interest on receiver's certificates, a comparatively low bid is acceptable.[70] It is competent to require an immediate deposit by the purchaser of a reasonable part of his bid.[71]

f. Persons Entitled to Purchase

Various persons are entitled to purchase at a foreclosure sale of railroad property, such as another corporation, a reorganization committee, and a trustee.

In the absence of statutory or contractual restriction, an individual may become the purchaser at a foreclosure sale of railroad property,[72] and may transfer the property to another corporation, as discussed infra § 329, and another corporation may be a purchaser,[73] although it already owns a majority of the stock in the foreclosed company.[74] Likewise, a reorganization committee may become the purchaser.[75] In judicial sales of railroads in interstate commerce it is seldom that there will be more than one bidder qualified to purchase the property, because the purchaser of the railroad must first obtain the approval of the interstate commerce commission.[76]

Persons named in mortgage. Who may become the purchasers at a foreclosure sale may be expressly provided for by the mortgage itself.[77]

Persons designated by statute. Such persons may purchase as are designated by statutes,[78] some of which require that the purchaser must be one capable not only of owning the property, but also of exercising the rights and powers and of assuming the duties incident to such ownership.[79]

Persons occupying fiduciary relationship generally. One who occupies a position of trust or confidence toward the mortgagor company, which would make it inequitable for him to acquire the title for himself, cannot become a purchaser.[80] A director of a company being a fiduciary cannot purchase the property of the company at a judicial sale without the consent of the company or permission of the chancellor who decreed the sale,[81] and, where the purchase is made by such a person, the company is entitled to a surrender of the road on placing the purchaser in statu quo,[82] but without such a tender the relief for the stockholders should be by a bill to redeem,[83] and not by an action to enforce a trust on the property in the hands of such director.[84]

Where all persons have an opportunity to bid, the fact that the road is purchased by the president of the company in his individual right will not in itself raise a trust relation between him and a holder of the bonds of the company which will entitle the latter to treat him as a trustee of the property so purchased.[85]

Trustee. A trustee cannot, as such, purchase property in which he has an individual interest,[86] but it has been held that a trustee for bondholders of an insolvent railway may become a purchaser.[87] A purchase by a mortgage trustee has been held to be voidable, although not absolutely void,[88] but junior mortgage creditors can only avoid such sale by tendering reimbursement.[89]

g. Confirmation of Sale

The general rules regulating the confirmation of foreclosure sales ordinarily are applicable to foreclosure sales of railroad property.

General rules relating to the confirmation of foreclosure sales ordinarily apply to foreclosure sales of railroad property.[90] Objections based on any substantial irregularity in the proceedings preliminary and leading up to the sale and which are prejudicial to the person objecting should be made to the confirmation of the sale,[91] but questions relating to the validity of the decree cannot ordinarily be so raised.[92] The question of adequacy of price remains for consideration after sale and on motion to confirm.[93] The confirmation of a sale of railroad property without an order nisi has been held to be irregular,[94] but, where such confirmation has resulted in no prejudice, it will not be set aside,[95] and after confirmation of the sale bondholders will not be allowed at a subsequent term to be made parties to the original suit for the purpose of impeaching the confirmation decree, although power to make further orders was reserved.[96]

Pending the ascertainment of preferential claims it is competent for the court to refuse confirmation until the amount to be paid in cash has been fixed and paid in,[97] or to confirm the sale subject to a lien for unpaid purchase money,[98] or to confirm the sale and withhold a conveyance until the purchase money is paid,[99] or to make a conveyance reserving a lien or right to retake and resell in default of payment.[1]

Confirmation of a sale to a reorganization committee will not be denied because of an agreement to forego a deficiency judgment[2] or in order to coerce payment by the reorganization committee to an objecting bondholder.[3] An application for confirmation of a sale may be allowed to be withdrawn where the sale of a portion of the road located in another state has been vacated on objections applicable to the sale which it is sought to confirm.[4]

Confirmation of the sale will not be refused because of inadequacy of the price realized where there is no showing that higher bids will be forthcoming,[5] and the objecting stockholders do not furnish a bond in the sum fixed by the court.[6]

Effect of confirmation. Where property was sold which was not included in the decree, a confirmation of the sale does not validate the sale of such property.[7]

h. Objections to Sale, Setting Aside, and Resale

(1) In general
(2) Grounds for vacating sale
(3) Proceedings to set aside foreclosure sale

(1) In General

Every person whose rights are injuriously affected by a decree of foreclosure of railroad property and a sale thereunder ordinarily has a right, unless estopped, to move to set aside the sale, although he was not a party to the action.

General rules governing objections to, and the setting aside of, foreclosure sales ordinarily are applicable to foreclosure sales of railroad property.[8]

Accordingly, as a general rule every person whose rights are injuriously affected by a decree of foreclosure and a sale under it has a right to move to set aside the sale, although he was not a party to the action.[9] Such objection may be made by the mortgagor company,[10] or by bondholders,[11] or stockholders,[12] and, where a purchaser makes default, and a private resale is made, the defaulting purchaser does not waive his right to complain of the resale.[13]

It has been held that the attorney general cannot intervene and stop a sale, even assuming that a sale by parcels would necessitate the discontinuance of the road.[14]

Estoppel to assert objections. A party who otherwise would be entitled to raise objections to the validity or irregularity of foreclosure and sale may be prevented from doing so on principles of estoppel,[15] as where he fails to interpose his objections by a proper proceeding and at a proper time.[16] Where the foreclosure suit required claimants to file claims, those failing to do so cannot attack the validity of the sale because of no receipt of money or an interest in the new company.[17]

Complainant who participates in the sale or bids may be estopped to question the validity of the sale.[18]

(2) Grounds for Vacating Sale

A foreclosure sale of railroad property may be set aside on various grounds, such as fraud, mistake, or surprise, or a grossly inadequate consideration.

A foreclosure sale of railroad property may be set aside on various grounds.[19] The validity and sufficiency of the proceedings in the foreclosure suit prior to the sale may not be questioned,[20] nor may other matters which were proper for adjudication in the foreclosure suit.[21] A motion to vacate generally cannot be based on grounds of objection which were or might have been set up in defense to the foreclosure suit or against the confirmation of the sale;[22] nor will a sale be set aside for any defects or irregularities which do not invalidate the title of the purchaser or work substantial or real injury to the rights of any party in interest.[23]

The fact that a minority of the bondholders or stockholders who have been given an opportunity to participate are dissatisfied with the plan of reorganization is not ground for setting aside the sale.[24]

Fraud, mistake, or surprise. A court of equity may vacate or set aside a foreclosure sale which is shown to be tainted with fraud or deceit,[25] as where the purchase has been made in pursuance of a corrupt scheme to gain possession of the railroad property inequitably,[26] as, for example, a transaction which looks toward the stifling of competition among bidders at the sale,[27] unless such agreement only suppressed bidding where there could be none.[28] A sale may also be set aside at the instance of the party injured on the ground of mistake or surprise.[29]

Inadequacy of price. A sale may be vacated where made for such a grossly inadequate consideration as to raise a presumption of fraud,[30] but the inadequacy must be so gross as to shock the conscience and show that it is not the result of fair dealing.[31]

(3) Proceedings to Set Aside Foreclosure Sale

The proceedings to set aside a foreclosure of railroad property ordinarily are governed by the rules regulating proceedings to set aside foreclosure sales generally.

The general rules applicable to proceedings to set aside foreclosure sales ordinarily govern proceedings to set aside a foreclosure sale of railroad property[32] as, for example, on questions of pleading,[33] or parties.[34] The party objecting must move promptly and act with diligence, and an unreasonable delay in the assertion of his objections, amounting to laches, and not explained or excused, is sufficient to bar him from relief.[35] The practice of some courts has been that in order to set a sale aside for inadequacy of price there must be a showing that some responsible person will make an advance bid.[36]

Relief granted. In ordering the sale to be set aside, the court should also make such orders as may be necessary to place the parties in the position they occupied before the sale, and to protect intervening parties,[37] and the court may, in the exercise of its discretion, accept bids in open court.[38] The decree under a bill to set aside a sale under a power should be no broader than is required by the pleadings.[39]

Resale. Where a lienor is entitled to be paid his lien out of the proceeds of such sale and his claim is not paid within a reasonable time out of such proceeds, a resale of the property may be ordered.[40] A resale will not be ordered after the period of redemption, for holders of liens who were not parties to the proceedings,[41] but such lienholders are entitled to a decree allowing them a reasonable time in which to redeem.[42]

A resale will not be ordered on an offer of a larger bid without the support of some special circumstances in aid of it,[43] particularly where it appears that the expenses of a resale would be large and the creditors would receive only a small additional sum, and that the purchaser desires immediately to equip and operate the railroad, and that the public interest requires that the operation should be begun as soon as possible.[44]

i. Operation and Effect

A sale under a decree of foreclosure of all the property and franchises of a railroad company and a conveyance of such property and franchises to the purchaser as directed by the court operates to divest the company of all its right, title, and interest therein.

A sale under a decree of foreclosure of all the property and franchises of a railroad company and a conveyance of such property and franchises to the purchaser as directed by the court operates to divest the company of all its right, title, and interest therein and leaves to it only its franchise to exist as a corporation.[45] After such sale the company cannot by any act or negligence of its own subject the property so sold, or the franchises of the company to exercise the rights, powers, and privileges of a railroad company in connection therewith, to any liability.[46] The debt secured by the mortgage is merged in the sale and the lien is extinguished by the sale.[47]

A purchase by a reorganization committee bars any proprietary interest on the part of the stockholders,[48] and a purchase by or on behalf of the bondholders changes them from the position of creditors of the company to that of ownership,[49] and all the rights of the stockholders in the railroad are lost and destroyed by the sale.[50]

Title to a judgment not covered by the mortgage does not vest in the purchaser at foreclosure sale.[51]

Franchises. Such sale vests the purchaser not only with the physical property sold, but also with the franchises to operate the property as a railroad.[52]

After-acquired property. The sale on a foreclosure of a railroad mortgage containing a general provision covering after-acquired property conveys title to such, although not mentioned in the decree of sale.[53]

What law governs. The property which will pass by a foreclosure sale is governed by the law of the state where the property is located;[54] so a sale in one state under foreclosure of a mortgage purporting to cover property in that state and another does not pass the property located in the latter in which such mortgage has been held to be invalid as to the property there.[55]

§ 328. Rights and Liabilities of Purchasers

The rights and liabilities of purchasers at foreclosure sales of railroad property are discussed infra §§ 329-338. The rights and liabilities of purchasers at mortgage foreclosure sales generally are considered in Mortgages §§ 586-594, 754-765, and the rights and liabilities of purchasers at sales foreclosing mechanics' liens generally are discussed in Mechanics' Liens §§ 344, 345.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 329. —— Corporate Capacity, Franchises, and Powers of Original Company

Unless authorized by statute, a purchaser at a foreclosure sale under a mortgage of the franchises and property of a railroad company does not, by virtue of his purchase, acquire the franchise of the company to exist as a corporation.

Unless authorized by statute,[56] a purchaser at a foreclosure sale under a mortgage of the franchises and property of a railroad company does not, by virtue of his purchase, acquire the franchise of the company to exist as a corporation,[57] without taking out a new charter.[58]

On the other hand, such purchase and transfer confer a right to reorganize as a new corporation subject to the laws existing at the time of the reorganization,[59] and as such to have possession of the property,[60] and to succeed to all the rights and privileges of the old company appurtenant to the maintenance and operation of the road,[61] such as the right to maintain and operate the road,[62] and receive the rents and profits,[63] except such as accrued before the purchaser became invested with the title and right of possession.[64] The purchaser is not entitled to the earnings of the road after confirmation of a sale if he persistently delays compliance with his bill and has not paid the purchase money.[65]

Although natural persons ordinarily cannot exercise the franchises conferred by the state on railroads, where they bid in the property at foreclosure, they may hold such property, including the franchises, and transmit it intact to a corporation authorized to exercise the franchises.[66]

Special statutory exemptions, privileges, and burdens. In the absence of express direction in the statute to that effect, or of an equivalent implication by necessary construction, a special statutory exemption or privilege granted to a railroad company,[67] such as immunity from taxation,[68] or a right to fix and determine rates of fare,[69] does not accompany the property in its transfer to a purchaser on foreclosure.

On the other hand, it has been held that a right of exemption from taxation passes under the general language of a statute passing "all the rights" of the original company,[70] and that, where the property and franchises of a railroad corporation authorized by special act to charge a certain rate of fare per mile are purchased by individuals and through various consolidations and mesne conveyances become a part of the system of another railroad corporation, the latter corporation, as long as the special act remains unrepealed, is entitled to charge on such portion of its line the rate authorized by the special act.[71] So it has been held that purchasers, not having any right to demand to be incorporated under the laws of the state, but voluntarily accepting the privileges and benefits of an incorporation law, are, as well as the corporation formed, estopped to repudiate the burdens attached by the statute to the privilege of becoming a corporation,[72] and are bound by the provisions of existing laws regulating rates of fare.[73]

Rights and liabilities as to private subscriptions and grants of public aid. The rights and liabilities of purchasers at foreclosure sales in respect of grants of public aid are determined by the terms of the grant, or by statutes relating to the rights and liabilities of such purchasers.[74] Where public aid has been earned by the original company, subsequent purchasers at a foreclosure sale or persons claiming under them are not bound by conditions or stipulations in the grant which do not constitute a charge on the property,[75] although it is otherwise where they constitute a charge on the road or its earnings.[76] Unless a subscription to a railroad has been accepted by the company, a new corporation to which the property and franchises are conveyed after their sale on foreclosure cannot accept or enforce the subscription.[77]

§ 330. —— Grantees or Successors of Purchasers

A grantee or successor of a purchaser at a foreclosure sale of railroad property is entitled to all of the rights of the purchaser.

A grantee or successor of a purchaser at a foreclosure sale of railroad property is entitled to all the rights of the purchaser,[78] and is also charged with infirmities of title arising from illegality in the sale, and with claims or equities which would have been available against the original purchaser,[79] except in so far as he is entitled to protection in the character of a purchaser in good faith without notice,[80] or except in so far as the duty or liability is incurred or imposed on the original purchasers personally.[81]

§ 331. —— Construction, Maintenance, and Operation

A purchaser of a railroad at a foreclosure sale ordinarily is bound to perform the duties to the public which are coupled with the enjoyment of the corporate privileges and which the original company owed to the public.

A purchaser of a railroad under foreclosure ordinarily is bound to perform the duties to the public which are coupled with the enjoyment of the corporate privileges and which the original company owed to the public,[82] such as the duty of properly constructing, repairing, equipping, and operating the road.[83] A decree requiring a specific part of a railroad to be maintained and operated is enforceable against a railroad company purchasing the property at foreclosure sale,[84] and the fact that the purchaser has leased a part of the road, and that such part is being operated in connection with the line of the lessee, does not excuse the purchaser from its duty under the decree.[85]

A purchaser's duty to construct is limited, however, to the portion mortgaged and purchased by him, and, where the old company has completed only a part of its road and this part is mortgaged and sold, the purchaser is not bound to complete the whole road.[86]

Right to discontinue operation. Purchasers on foreclosure have the same right as the original company to cease operation of the road when it can be operated only at a loss.[87] Where a road has been dismantled, such purchasers are not bound to restore it to its former condition in order that it may be operated by others as a public highway.[88] Where discontinuance or removal of a railroad is authorized by statute, the statutory provisions must be complied with.[89]

Location of offices and shops A sale under foreclosure does not free the property in the hands of the purchaser from the provisions of the statute forbidding the removal of the general offices, machine shops, and roundhouses from the place where they were originally located,[90] although the purchaser's articles of incorporation fixed the location of its general offices at a different place.[91]

§ 332. —— Contracts in General

A purchaser of railroad property at foreclosure sale is not bound by an obligation of a railroad company which is of a strictly personal character.

A purchaser of railroad property at foreclosure sale is not bound by an obligation of a railroad company which is of a strictly personal character,[92] such as a contract to maintain a depot at a certain place[93] or to give free annual passes over the line of the railroad.[94]

In other words, such purchaser takes the property free from all liability on contracts,[95] except such as are a lien on, or otherwise bind, the property and franchises purchased,[96] and except where the purchaser either expressly or by necessary implication adopts or assumes the contract previously made with the mortgagor company,[97] or liability thereon is provided for in the decree,[98] or created by statute;[99] or unless the contract is one running with the land and which would have passed under a deed of the road [1]

Traffic contracts with other railroad companies do not run with the land or create a lien on the property, and, hence, are not binding on the purchaser at foreclosure sale [2]

Provisions in decree for disclaimer. The decree of foreclosure and sale may expressly provide that the purchaser may be at liberty to adopt or disclaim certain agreements made by the mortgagor company.[3]

Rights of purchaser. Where a decree on foreclosure contemplates that the interest of the mortgagee, the receiver, and the mortgagor company shall pass to the purchaser, and transfers are executed accordingly, the rights of the mortgagor under a contract with a telegraph company for the maintenance of a telegraph line on the railroad right of way are enforceable by the purchaser.[4]

§ 333. —— Right of Way and Other Interests in Land

The purchaser at a foreclosure sale of railroad property acquires all right, title, and interest of the mortgagor company in and to the railroad property covered by the description contained in the mortgage and decree of sale.

The purchaser at a foreclosure sale of railroad property acquires all right, title, and interest of the mortgagor company in and to the railroad property covered by the description contained in the mortgage and decree of sale [5] Thus, a railroad company's interest in the right of way passes to a purchaser under a foreclosure of a mortgage embracing all of the company's right in the property,[6] as does also all other property, rights, and franchises covered by the foreclosed mortgage and adapted to the purchaser's use and substantially described in the deed of conveyance.[7] On the other hand, the purchaser takes no greater rights in the property than those held by the mortgagor.[8] He takes no title to land which had been purchased by the railroad company without power to do so, although the mortgage covered all its property, franchises, etc.,[9] or to land previously conveyed by the mortgagor by deed in which the trustee in the mortgage joined.[10] The sale of a railroad under a mortgage before the damages of the landowner are paid or secured will not divest the right of such landowner to recover compensation for the occupancy of his land from the purchaser of the railroad at the mortgage sale.[11]

Easements, reservations, and restrictions. The purchaser takes the property subject to easements in the adjoining landowners,[12] or in other railroad companies,[13] and subject to any other reservations, conditions, or restrictions imposed by the instrument under which the mortgagor's title vested.[14] Where the right of a railroad company in another person's land constitutes merely an easement rather than title to the land, the purchaser at the foreclosure sale succeeds to no greater right or interest than an easement.[15]

§ 334. —— Leases

A purchaser under a mortgage foreclosure sale of railroad property who enters into possession of and operates a road leased by the mortgagor railroad company is bound by the terms of the lease as long as he remains in possession and use thereof.

Where a purchaser under foreclosure of the property, rights, and franchises of a railroad company which had leased a certain line or a part thereof from another company enters into possession and operates the leased road, such purchaser is bound by the terms of the lease with the mortgagor company as long as he remains in possession and use thereof,[16] although there has been no formal assignment of the lease,[17] and although the leased line is not included in the property purchased, as in such case, if the purchaser enters into possession and operates it, he must be regarded as an assignee of the lease and liable for the rents which the original lessee had agreed to pay,[18] except in so far as the lease has been modified by an agreement between the lessor and the lessee.[19]

The purchaser, however, may abandon or disclaim a lease made by the mortgagor company pending foreclosure proceedings, particularly where the terms of the decree give the purchaser such right.[20]

§ 335. —— Indebtedness, Securities, Liens, and Mortgages

A purchaser under a foreclosure sale of the property and franchises of a railroad company is not liable merely by reason of its succession for the debts of the old company not secured by prior liens.

A purchaser under foreclosure of the property and franchises of a railroad company is not liable merely by reason of its succession for the debts of the old company not secured by prior liens,[21] unless such purchaser expressly or by necessary implication agrees to pay or assume them,[22] or unless such liability is created by statute,[23] or unless it affirmatively appears that the circumstances attending the creation of the new corporation and its succession to the property and franchises of the mortgagor company are such as to warrant a finding that it is in reality a continuation of the old company,[24] or unless the purchaser's liability for the debts of the old company is provided for in the decree or order of sale,[25] in which case claimant must establish his claim in accordance with the terms of the decree.[26] The mere fact that purchasers knew that certain judgments had been decreed to be first liens on the property does not render a company organized by such company to operate the road liable for the amount of the judgment.[27]

Liens and encumbrances. The purchaser takes his title subject to all prior valid liens and encumbrances of which he had, or ought to have had, notice, and which are not cut off by the foreclosure proceedings,[28] such as a vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase money,[29] or a lien in favor of the state for public aid granted,[30] particularly where the decree of foreclosure and sale so provides.[31] The doctrine of caveat emptor as applied to judicial sales ordinarily operates not only to deprive the purchaser of a railroad sold under foreclosure of any recourse against the proceeds of the property because of existing encumbrances or tax liens on the property, but also of any claim to reimbursement for such liens from a fund in court or in the hands of a receiver, derived from the earnings of the property during the receivership, unless the decree or order of sale, or special equitable considerations, give him a right to such reimbursement.[32]

Subrogation of purchaser. Where a decree requires the purchasers to pay all valid claims outstanding against the receiver growing out of the operation of the road by him, such payments are a part of the purchase price for which the purchasers receive full equivalent in the property conveyed, and they are not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the holders of claims against the receiver so paid, as creditors of the mortgagor company.[33]

Consolidation after sale. Where the purchaser organizes a new company, with legislative authority to receive and exercise the franchise, such purchaser takes the property discharged of all debts which were not prior liens,[34] and, on a subsequent consolidation with another company, the consolidated company does not become liable for the debts of the original company, notwithstanding a statute enacted subsequent to the consolidation provides that on a consolidation the new company shall be liable for all debts of the old.[35] Where one railroad company purchases the property and franchises of another at a sale under a deed of trust, and after such sale the legislature passes an act for the merger of the two companies, which is not passed in contemplation of an agreement between them, but merely in order to authorize the purchasing company to operate the road purchased, the latter company does not thereby subject itself to the liabilities of the purchaser.[36]

§ 336. —— Interveners and Other Claimants

A purchaser at a foreclosure sale of railroad property is chargeable with notice that a particular lien will, or may, be claimed where claimant has intervened in the foreclosure proceedings and obtained leave to proceed in another court to establish his lien.

The purchaser at a foreclosure sale of railroad property is chargeable with notice that a particular lien will, or may, be claimed where claimant has intervened in the foreclosure proceedings and obtained leave to proceed in another court to establish his lien,[37] but such purchaser is not bound to look beyond what appears on the face of the record and anticipate a future claim for a lien,[38] and if claimant fails to bring his claim to the notice of the court, he is without remedy after decree and distribution,[39] unless his claim is one which by the decree is imposed on, and subject to which the purchasers acquire title to, the property.[40] Where the original foreclosure suit is still pending, and the order confirming the sale specifies that any taxes which may finally be adjudged to be a lien on the property should be a liability on the railroad, the purchasers at the sale have sufficient notice of the claim,[41] and, in an intervening petition filed in the original suit to collect the delinquent taxes, the purchasers need not be made parties.[42]

A claimant cannot, by intervention in the foreclosure proceeding, seek to impeach the validity of the decree and sale, as this can only be done by an original suit.[43] Where the purchaser has paid his bid in full according to the decree and the sale is confirmed, he cannot be compelled further to pay a claim which is adjudicated against the receiver after the confirmation of sale.[44]

As against an unforeclosed lien, the purchaser may intervene in a suit to enforce such lien and assert the equities and rights to which he succeeds by virtue of his purchase, and if they are such that a sale under such lien will not convey a good title, but merely cloud the title of the intervener, the sale should not be ordered.[45]

§ 337. —— Vacation or Invalidity of Sale

Purchasers at a foreclosure sale of a railroad are liable as trustees for the full value of the road where they purchase pursuant to an arrangement which constitutes a fraud on creditors.

Where the purchasers at a foreclosure sale of a railroad become such through an arrangement which is a fraud on the creditors, such purchasers are liable as trustees for the full value of the road,[46] and are chargeable with interest on the claims of the complaining creditors from the date of the sale to that of the final decree in the suit to set aside the sale.[47] Although the purchase was in bad faith and the sale is set aside, the purchaser may be entitled to compensation for reconstructing and repairing the road and putting it in working order, where it was in a state of complete dilapidation and ruin when bought.[48] Where a purchaser fails to make good his bid, not for want of funds but because he thinks the price too high, he cannot be excused on a resale of the property for a less price from making good the difference if the unsecured creditors will be benefited thereby.[49]

§ 338. —— Actions or Proceedings by or against Purchasers

In actions or proceedings by or against a purchaser at a foreclosure sale of railroad property the general rules controlling civil actions ordinarily are applicable.

General rules regulating civil actions ordinarily apply in actions or proceedings by or against a purchaser at a foreclosure sale of railroad property,[50] on questions of parties,[51] pleading,[52] including issues, proof, and variance,[53] and evidence.[54] A purchaser or his assignee may have a writ of assistance to recover possession of the road, or a portion thereof, which is unlawfully withheld;[55] or he may maintain ejectment for the mortgaged premises before condition broken unless there is a stipulation to the contrary.[56]

Under the rule that one having an adequate remedy at law may not resort to equity, where the property of a railroad company is acquired by another railroad company after foreclosure proceedings which are void as against a holder of bonds guaranteed by the mortgagor company, such bondholder is not entitled to sue the purchasing company in equity and apply the assets so transferred to the payment of his bonds until he has exhausted his legal remedies against the mortgagor.[57] However, one having a lien against railroad property sold under foreclosure which is unenforceable at law because it is not within the provisions of a statute giving a legal remedy under specified conditions may enforce his claim in equity.[58] A court of equity which has obtained jurisdiction of a controversy involving the purchase of railroad property in receivership will retain jurisdiction to administer complete relief.[59]

Laches will bar prosecution of a claim against the purchaser of railroad property in receivership.[60]

Judgment. Under a statute requiring purchasers of railroad property at a receiver's sale to file an assumption of existing liabilities before operating the railroad, personal judgment to the amount of the value of the property purchased may be rendered against the purchaser in a suit to collect a claim accruing during the receivership.[61] Where the purchasers of railroad property at a receiver's sale later sell to others for an unauthorized dismantlement of the road, in a suit against both sets of purchasers for claims accruing during receivership, judgment may properly be entered against the original purchasers as well as against the subsequent purchasers.[62]

Damages. Where the purchasers of a railroad at a receiver's sale attempt to dismantle the road without authority, damages in actions against them on claims arising during the receivership may be

§ 339. Purchase and Reorganization

a. In general
b. Purchase and reorganization under reorganization agreement
c. Reorganization by purchasers at foreclosure sale
d. Nature and validity of reorganization plan in general

a. In General

The reorganization of railroad companies has been effected through the medium of an equity receivership.

Reorganization of railroad companies has sometimes been effected through the medium of an equity receivership,[68] and prior to the passage of § 77 of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C.A. § 205, providing for railroad reorganization under the bankruptcy law, the only juridical mode of railroad reorganization was in equity.[69]

On reorganization of a railroad company through a receivership the court must take cognizance of the entire plan of reorganization and act accordingly.[70] A determination of the fairness of the plan of reorganization is a part of the equity power of the court.[71] The court has and will exercise authority to see that all equitable rights in, or connected with, the property are secured;[72] and has power to administer the property by authorizing its transfer to a reorganized company pursuant to a plan approved by a large majority of the creditors.[73] Questions relating to the inclusion or exclusion of

Settlement of conflicting claims to res

In receivership proceeding wherein plan for reorganization of railway company was proposed, close questions of interpretations of after-acquired property clauses in mortgages, preferences in stock certificates, divisional mortgages, and the like will give rise to honest doubts as to which security holders have first claim to certain assets, and settlement of such conflicting claims to the res in possession of district court is a normal part of process of reorganization, and the court, in sanctioning settlements by adjustment or compromise, is not bowing to nuisance claims, but is administering the proceedings in an economical and practical manner.—Chase Nat. Bank of City of New York v. Wabash Ry. Co., D.C.Mo., 40 F.Supp. 859.

Retention of jurisdiction

In receivership proceeding wherein plan for reorganization of railway company was proposed, where participation of another railroad company by purchase of capital stock of reorganized company pursuant to Interstate Commerce Act was an integral part of the compromises underlying the plan, district court, for full protection of parties who had made compromises and accepted the plan on such condition, would retain complete jurisdiction of cause, notwithstanding sale and transfer of properties of old company to reorganized company or to any other company, with full power to retake and ultimately to resell the properties and on such retaking to proceed de novo.—Chase Nat. Bank of City of New York v. Wabash Ry. Co., supra.

Purchase and reorganization under agreement generally see infra subdivision b of this section.

Necessity for sale

(1) While in railroad and other corporate reorganizations under Bankruptcy Act formal procedure of sale has been dispensed with, in equity sale is still regarded as a necessary procedural step in reorganization to bind interests of nonassenters to the plan.—Guaranty Trust Co. of N. Y. v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., D.C.Va., 60 F.Supp. 607.

(2) However, it has been held that where a judgment creditor in the decree in reorganization was adjudged and secured his equitable

subsidiary lines should be left to the business judgment of those in charge[74] except in case of fraud or a grossly inadequate consideration.[75]

Where in the course of a reorganization of a railroad company in equity receivership proceedings the reorganization managers or committee, as authorized by the court in the reorganization proceedings, purchased with funds held by the receiver of the company certain bonds of another railroad company which prior to the receivership had been leased to the first company and which after disaffirmance of the lease by the receiver was operated by the first company under orders of the interstate commerce commission, such bonds are not held for the account of the other railroad company or its trustee.[76]

Effect of Bankruptcy Act on proceedings in equity. The Bankruptcy Act § 77, 11 U.S.C.A. § 205, enacted March 3, 1933, and since amended, providing for the reorganization of railroad companies, as discussed in Bankruptcy §§ 881–962, has been held not to render equity receivership proceedings unavailable for railroad reorganizations.[77] However, reorganization under the bankruptcy act ordinarily is to be preferred to the equity proceeding[78] and it has been held that it is improper for an equity court to entertain a suit for a railroad reorganization after the passage of the federal statute allowing proceedings for reorganization in bankruptcy and that an equity proceeding should be dismissed if the irregularity is called to the attention of the court, at least where creditors or stockholders may be adversely affected by a failure to have the reorganization conducted under the Bankruptcy Act.[79] On the other hand, where the equity proceeding had been commenced prior to the passage of the federal statute permitting reorganization under the bankruptcy law, the equity proceeding may be continued where all the interested parties prefer its continuation and proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act would result in protracted delay, in view of the fact that the public interest will be protected by the provisions of the federal statute, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 b, requiring that the approval of the interstate commerce commission to the new capitalization be obtained.[80]

The principles controlling the reorganization of railroads under the Bankruptcy Act are to a great share of the property which the court administered it was not necessary that the property be transferred to the reorganized company through the medium of a judicial sale.—Phipps v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., C.C.A.Mo., 284 F. 945, 28 A.L.R. 1184, error dismissed 43 S.Ct. 701, 262 U.S. 762, 67 L.Ed. 1221.

Continued operation as creating fiduciary relationship

Disaffirmance by reorganization committee of lease, under which railroad in equity reorganization had formerly operated another railroad and continued operation thereof by committee because of lessor's refusal to resume operation and interstate commerce commission's refusal to permit abandonment, created no fiduciary relationship with respect to financing or general affairs of lessor, so as to impress bonds of lessor purchased by reorganization committee with funds belonging to mortgage creditors for account of such creditors with option in favor of lessor to purchase such bonds at price paid therefor by committee plus interest.—Guaranty Trust Co. of N. extent applicable to a reorganization through equity procedure.[81]

Appointment of master. In equity proceedings for the reorganization of a railroad the court may appoint a special master to formulate a plan of reorganization,[82] and a rule of civil procedure providing that in an action tried without a jury the court shall accept findings of fact of a master unless clearly erroneous is especially imperative where the master, for a period of several years, had patiently studied the complex questions involved and had listened with painstaking care in extended hearings to the arguments and proposals of all of the parties who desired to be heard.[83]

Capitalization of new company. A basic requirement of any reorganization of a railroad company in equity receivership proceedings is the determination of a capitalization which makes it possible not only to respect the priorities of the various classes of claimants but also to give the new company a reasonable prospect for survival.[84] In determining the permissible capitalization of the new company the primary test is the earning power of the new company, that is, how much the enterprise in all probabilities will earn.[85] Only a meticulous regard for earning capacity can afford the old security holders protection against a dilution of their priorities and can give the new company some safeguards against the scourge of overcapitalization; disregard of that method of valuation can only bring a harvest of barren regrets.[86] Where the railroad company's temporary large earnings are clearly due to special war-time causes, such earnings may not be made the basis for capitalization of the reorganized company.[87]

The substitution of a simple, conservative capital structure for a highly complicated one may be a primary requirement of any reorganization plan.[88] There is no necessity to construct the new capital structure on the framework of the old.[89] Where unified operations of separate properties are deemed advisable and essential, the elimination of divisional mortgages may be necessary as well as wise.[90]

The proposed capitalization of a reorganized railroad company must receive the approval of the interstate commerce commission.[91]

Allocation of new securities. The problems involved in the plan for allocation of new securities in an equity reorganization proceeding are to a very large extent problems of business interests and are controlled thereby rather than by definite rules of law.[92] What will constitute a fair and equitable allocation is necessarily a matter of judgment to be based on careful consideration of all of the relevant facts.[93] In allocating the new securities among secured creditors, a prior lien must be fully and fairly compensated in value in what is received therefor in the new securities, before subordinate liens may participate.[94] Creditors having claims of prior rank must receive compensation in some way if any portion of their preferred position is surrendered to junior liens.[95]

95. U.S.—Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co., D.C.Va., 53 F.Supp. 672, af-

Where new system mortgages are substituted for old divisional mortgages it is necessary to fit each into the hierarchy of the new capital structure in such a way that each will retain with relation to the other the same position it formerly had in respect of assets and of earnings at various levels, and, if that is done, each has obtained new securities which are the equitable equivalent of its previous rights and the full priority rule is satisfied.[96] It is sufficient in allotting securities to a mortgage division if compensation is awarded on a fair and equitable basis having regard for the relative value of the divisional property, and, if this is done, it is not required that each class of creditors shall receive securities of equal rank with their former holdings.[97]

Where there are several mortgage divisions of a railroad, for the purpose of allocating the new securities the relative value of each division must be ascertained.[98] The contribution which each division makes to a system is not a mere matter of arithmetical computation, but involves an appraisal of many factors and the exercise of an informed judgment.[99] Earnings are recognized as a most important criterion in determining the value of the several divisions for the purpose of apportionment of the new securities.[1] but it does not follow that earning power must be used to ascertain the values of the several divisions.[2] There is no fixed or inflexible rule for calculating such earnings where a railroad system has been operated as a whole and there has been no need to segregate the earnings of the several parts.[3] What should be done is to determine the earnings of the whole system and then ascertain the relative earning power of each division in relation to all other divisions in the system and not only the individual earnings of the single system, but also the contribution which it makes to the system as a whole should be considered, and the sum total of these factors will represent the earning power of the divisions.[4]

On appeal from a decision of the court allocating the new securities, the burden is on appellants to show that the allocation of securities is inequitable or unfair to them and that the lower court stepped beyond the bounds of his discretion in giving it his approval.[5] The assertions on appeal that the test period selected for determining divisional earnings was unfair to a certain division, and that the allocation of securities approved by the lower court gave such division the poorest treatment of all of the divisions, relate primarily to questions of fact which are

Deduction of rental charge from earnings

In equity reorganization of railroad, subsidaries, and leased lines, subject to underlying divisional and general mortgages, where link of specified division was leased, the annual charge therefor was deducted from the earnings of the division in valuing such division to fix its relative participation in proposed securities of reorganized railroad.—Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co., D.C.Va., 53 F.Supp. 672, affirmed, C.C.A., Badenhausen v. Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, 145 F.2d 40, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 440, 323 U.S. 797, 89 L.Ed. 636.

Matters not considered in fixing value

(1) In equity reorganization of railroad subject to underlying divisional and general mortgages, evidence did not sustain contention that certain railroad property allegedly valued at about a million dollars was not taken into account in valuing property of deficit subsidiary line in determining allocation of securities of reorganized railroad.—Badenhausen v. Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, C.C.A.Va., 145 F.2d 40, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 440, 323 U.S. 797, 89 L.Ed. 636.

(2) In equity reorganization of railroad system subject to underlying divisional and general mortgages, contention of bondholders of deficit line or subsidiary of unfair treatment because no allowance was made to them as to covenant in a lease of railroad and equipment by such deficit line to another railroad which subsequently merged into the system could not be sustained because, even if breach of covenant chargeable to reorganized railroad was disclosed, nothing would have been added to value of bondholders' securities where obligation in such lease was not supported by any security or lien so that a breach of covenant would create only an unsecured claim for which reorganization plan provided no payment.—Badenhausen v. Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, supra.

for the special master appointed to formulate a plan and the lower court to determine.[6]

Discharge of receiver. Where the reorganization proceedings have progressed so far towards completion as to make it practicable to discharge the receivers, the court may enter an order discharging the receivers from further responsibility but preserving their official status to the extent necessary to enable them to take any action deemed appropriate to perfect or further assure the title of the railroad company to any property or interest to which it may be entitled as an incident of the reorganization.[7]

Expenses of reorganization. Allowances for fees and expenses in an equity reorganization of a railroad must be just and reasonable, but moderate rather than generous.[8]

b. Purchase and Reorganization under Reorganization Agreement

(1) In general
(2) Reorganization committee or trustee

(1) In General

In the absence of statutory restrictions, the stockholders, bondholders, and other creditors of an insolvent railroad company, or a number of them, may enter into an arrangement by which the property shall be sold under foreclosure and purchased by trustees or a committee for their benefit and a new company organized to receive the property and operate the road.

In the absence of statutory restrictions, where a railroad company is in an insolvent condition, its bonded indebtedness being equal to, or in excess of, the value of its property, it is lawful for the stockholders, bondholders, and other creditors of such road, or a number of them, to enter into an arrangement by which the property shall be sold under foreclosure and purchased by trustees or a committee for their benefit and a new company organized to receive the property and operate the road,[9] provided such arrangement is not made in fraud of other creditors[10] or of the stockholders,[11] as where it has the effect of restraining bidding at the foreclosure sale.[12] A contract for reorganization made between bondholders and stockholders, which involves the transfer of the corporate property to a new corporation, is proper and binding as between the parties.[13]

Persons entitled to make agreement. A reorganization agreement may be made between the creditors and bondholders without the concurrence of the stockholders,[14] or between bondholders and stockholders,[15] or between the bondholders themselves,[16] or between bondholders, stockholders, and unsecured creditors.[17]

the terms of the reorganization plan, the reorganization committee and its successors have the power to vote on a certain per cent of the stock to be issued, the fact that a member of such committee has disposed of stock belonging to him individually does not affect his authority as a member of the committee to act as director and to hold and vote on the trust stock.[19] The mere fact that some of the trustees under a mortgage are holders of bonds secured by their trust does not make them incompetent to consent to a decree of foreclosure embodying a plan for reorganization;[20] if everything is honestly done by the trustee, and the courts are satisfied that the rights of others have not been prejudiced to the advantage of the trustees, the mere fact of interest is not sufficient to justify the withholding of a confirmation of his acts.[21]

A reorganization agreement providing for the selection of trustees by the bondholders, and permitting the court to make minor changes in the plan, does not authorize the court to designate as trustee one whose selection has not been assented to by a majority of the bondholders;[22] and under such a plan a trustee need not be a resident of the judicial district within which the designated court has jurisdiction.[23]

(b) Rights and Powers

The rights and powers of a reorganization committee of a railroad company usually are defined and limited by the agreement under which they are appointed and act.

The rights and powers of a reorganization trustee or committee of a railroad company are usually defined and limited by the agreement under which they are appointed and act,[24] and ordinarily they are given large discretionary powers in formulating or carrying out the reorganization plan,[25] and the assenting bondholders may act even further and agree in advance that the bonds may be subjected to any plan of reorganization which the committee may adopt.[26]

If the committee enters into a contract in good faith within the scope of the authority given to it, its action is valid and binding,[27] and cannot be adjudged null and void at the suit of a dissatisfied bondholder in the absence of any allegation of fraud on the part of the persons with whom it contracted or of a participation by them in some fraud of the committee,[28] since the persons so contracting with the committee are independent contractors and stand in no relation of trust and owe no trust duty to the bondholders.[29]

Construction of agreement as to powers. Where the committee is given power to construe the reorganization agreement, as to its powers with respect to the reorganization,[30] it must act in good faith in construing the agreement;[31] and where an agreement giving such power is prepared by the committee, and the language used is wholly its own, it should be construed in this respect most favorably to the bondholders or other parties thereto.[32]

Change of plans. The committee has no power to change or modify the plan of reorganization[33] except to the extent that it is given such power by the reorganization agreement;[34] and, where it is given such power, the terms of the reorganization plan can be changed only by concerted action of the committee or a majority of it in the exercise of its power and for the benefit of the company and not for its own benefit.[35]

Where it is authorized to do anything it deems best for the bondholders' interests, it may, where a plan of reorganization announced by it has proved impracticable, adopt and put in execution a new plan,[36] and cannot be required, at the suit of the original bondholders, to execute the original plan as a trust.[37]

Reimbursement. If the committee acts in good faith, it is entitled to reimbursement for expenses incurred or advances made by it personally or on its credit in the execution of its trust,[38] and it is not necessary before bringing an action for an accounting therefor that it turn over to the beneficiaries new securities received under the reorganization scheme.[39] However, the bondholders cannot be charged with the expenses incurred by the committee on a former attempt to reorganize the company to which they did not assent.[40]

(c) Duties and Liabilities

The purchasing committee under a reorganization of a railroad company becomes a trustee at least for such beneficiaries as are parties to the reorganization agreement.

The purchasing trustee or committee under a reorganization of a railroad company becomes a trustee for all the beneficiaries,[41] or at least for such as are parties to the reorganization agreement,[42] and, as such, is accountable to them for the property or its proceeds[43] or for a breach of the reorganization agreement.[44]

The committee should act in good faith in carrying out the powers and duties intrusted to it,[45] and, if it does so, it will not be held liable for its mistakes,[46] such as for the failure of the plan of reorganization, which proved impracticable,[47] especially where the agreement expressly exempts it from personal liability for its acts except in cases of willful malfeasance or gross negligence,[48] and especially as to a bondholder who, by his own negligence, failed to share in the benefits of the plan as finally carried out.[49] The committee may be held liable for a breach of trust in carrying out the scheme,[50] as in bidding in the property at a judicial sale.[51]

Parties to the agreement may not object to acts of the committee which are not injurious to their interests.[52]

Time for formulation of plan. Where the committee has the power and duty of formulating a reorganization plan, it is the better practice for it to formulate such plan before final decree and sale of the property, in order that dissenting bondholders may be heard and granted such relief by the court as may be equitable;[53] and where the agreement requires the committee to report its plan to the bondholders so that any of them may withdraw if the plan is not satisfactory and recover back the bonds deposited by them, the committee impliedly agrees to prepare a plan and submit it to the bondholders before the property is sold under foreclosure.[54]

Notice of plan. The projectors of a plan for the readjustment of the respective interests of the mortgage creditors and stockholders of the railroad are not bound to provide for any notice,[55] and no provision for a notice of such plan can be implied where it is simply left to the discretion of the trustees whether or not to give any notice;[56] and, even where the plan for such readjustment requires the trustee to give notice of the time fixed, notice to stockholders by publication is sufficient.[57]

c. Reorganization by Purchasers at Foreclosure Sale

Some statutes authorize or require the purchasers of railroad property at a foreclosure sale to organize a new company for the purpose of receiving and operating the purchased road.

Some statutes authorize or require the purchasers of a railroad, at a foreclosure sale thereof, to organize a new company for the purpose of receiving and operating the purchased road.[58] Under these statutes such purchasers may organize a corporation under any name they may adopt,[59] but in organizing the corporation they must comply with all the statutory requirements.[60] Such a statute does not authorize a transaction which is not in any proper sense an arrangement for the reorganization of an existing railroad,[61] and hence does not apply where the purchasing company does not contemplate operating or maintaining the line of the old company.[62]

Such statutory authority also is intended to meet a case where there is no existing corporation capable of holding the property and exercising the franchises,[63] and hence it does not apply where the purchaser is a corporation already existing and capable of holding the railroad property and exercising the franchise,[64] and does not prevent the purchaser from transferring the property and franchise to such a company,[65] and where there is such a transfer, and the line so acquired is already constructed, it is not essential for the purchasing company to file a map of the line thus acquired.[66]

Under a statutory provision that on conveyance to a purchaser of corporate property under a foreclosure sale the purchaser shall forthwith be a new corporation, a foreign railroad company which buys in railroad property, franchises, etc., at such a sale becomes a new domestic corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the state courts.[67]

Supervision. Under some statutes the public service commission has authority to supervise the carrying out of a purchasers' plan of reorganization,[68] but cannot pass on its propriety.[69]

d. Nature and Validity of Reorganization Plan in General

A plan of reorganization for a railroad company will be approved by the court in equity proceedings where it is fair, equitable, and wise for the parties concerned.

In equity proceedings for the reorganization of a railroad, a plan of reorganization will be approved by the court where it is fair, equitable, and wise from the standpoint of all of the parties.[70] In reorganizing an insolvent railroad company it has been held to be the better practice to reorganize the enterprise on the basis of existing mortgages as stock, or something which is equivalent, and by a new mortgage, with a lien superior to the old, raise the money which is required;[71] and a plan of reorganization by a purchaser at a foreclosure sale will generally be favored by the court when it is based on a conservative estimate of the future and so soundly framed as to withstand the dangers of financial and commercial stress.[72] If the arrange-

Plan held fair and equitable
U.S.—Chase Nat. Bank of City of New York v. Wabash Ry. Co., supra.
Assumption by court in determining fairness of plan
In receivership proceeding wherein plan for reorganization of railway company was proposed, where some of controversial issues related primarily to development of a complete formula for allocation of system earnings to mortgage sections, and controversies were settled by interested parties on allocations of new securities of reorganized company to holders of securities of old company based primarily upon traffic density charts, district court, in determining whether reorganization plan was fair and equitable, would assume that any deviations from charts which could be justified were not overlooked in the negotiations and were reflected in the final adjustments under the proposed plan.—Chase Nat. Bank of City of New York v. Wabash Ry. Co., supra.

ment is made in good faith, it is not rendered invalid by the fact that the purchasers of the property are the same persons as those who comprise the new corporation.[73] The fairness of a plan may properly be determined on a motion to confirm a sale under a bid which includes such plan;[74] and in determining its fairness the fact that the plan has the approval of a great majority of the bondholders is entitled to great weight,[75] but is not controlling.[76]

The fact that a creditor of the railroad company holds money and securities belonging to it may be considered in determining the fairness, as to bondholders, of a plan for settling his claim and releasing such security.[77] A plan which admits bonds secured by a particular division of the railroad to further security on other property does not unfairly favor such bonds as against refunding bonds where the latter are admitted to further security on such division.[78]

Exchange of securities. It may be arranged that the new securities to be issued by the new company shall be exchanged for, and extinguish, the bonds of the old company,[79] where the demand therefor is made in proper time.[80] The fixing of a reasonable time within which bonds must be deposited in order to participate in a reorganization is proper[81] and does not constitute coercion of the bondholders by depriving them of time to attack the reorganization plan.[82]

The bondholders, however, need not always be given securities of the same rank as those theretofore held by them,[83] and so a reorganization plan under which holders of refunding bonds of the old company receive for part of their claims junior bonds is not necessarily unfair.[84]

§ 340. —— Rights of Bondholders and Other Creditors

a. In general
b. Binding effect of agreement; right to withdraw
c. Operation and validity of purchase
d. Rights of nonparticipating bondholders
e. Rights of other creditors

a In General

After a sale and reorganization of a railroad, the rights of bondholders who have come into or assented to such arrangement ordinarily are governed by the terms of the reorganization agreement.

After a sale and reorganization of a railroad, the rights of bondholders who have come into or assented to such arrangement ordinarily are governed by the terms of the reorganization agreement.[85] Where the agreement provides for the issue of stock of the new company, to be divided among bondholders in proportion to the number of bonds deposited by them, on entering into the agreement, a bondholder, regardless of the amount at which the new corporation is capitalized, is entitled to only the proportion of the stock issued to represent property purchased which his bonds bear to the whole amount of bonds secured by the mortgage foreclosed.[86]

Any bondholder who by the terms of the agreement is offered the privilege of coming in has a right to be admitted and participate in the benefits

Plan held fair and equitable

U.S.—Chase Nat. Bank of City of New York v. Wabash Ry. Co., D.C.Mo., 40 F.Supp. 859.

Priority as to unpaid interest

In receivership proceeding wherein plan for reorganization of railway company was proposed, unpaid interest on bonds was entitled to same priority as the principal.—Chase Nat. Bank of City of New York v. Wabash Ry. Co., supra.

86. N.Y.—White v. Wood, 29 N.E. 525, 129 N.Y. 527.—White v. Wood, 21 N.Y.S. 1124, affirmed 37 N.E. 108, 142 N.Y. 656.

of the reorganization,[87] provided he applies to come in within the time fixed by the agreement[88] and complies or offers to comply with other terms or conditions prescribed by the agreement.[89] Such a bondholder may sue to compel the disclosure to him of the plan of reorganization which is about to be carried into effect[90] or for a specific enforcement of the agreement and other equitable relief.[91] A bondholder may also intervene personally or by committee to object to a plan of reorganization proposed in a foreclosure suit at any time when the matter is before the court for its approval.[92]

Where the lien of certain mortgage bonds is subordinate to the lien of other mortgage bonds and the claim of such other bonds is not fully satisfied by the allocation of new securities, the holders of the subordinate bonds are not entitled to participate in the capitalization of the reorganized company in equity proceedings,[93] and the holders of such subordinate bonds are barred by laches from petitioning, long after approval of the plan of reorganization by the court, for an order directing the receivers to make payment on such bonds.[94]

Statutory protection. Under some statutes, if the mortgage is foreclosed and the property purchased on the application of a number of the bondholders, it inures to the benefit of all the bondholders,[95] and each mortgage bondholder becomes a stockholder in the property covered by the mortgage, in the proportion that his bonds bear to the whole issue covered by the mortgage,[96] and, if the right to participate is denied a bondholder, he may maintain an action to recover the damages sustained by reason of such refusal.[97]

Equities of bondholders of subsidiary lines. On reorganization of a railroad system, first mortgage bondholders of a subsidiary line, whose bonds were assumed by the principal company on its purchase of the line, occupy a dual position, first as mortgagees of the principal line, and second as general creditors of the purchasing company;[98] and their rights should be recognized in both relations by giving them the benefit of their security, its value to be agreed on or determined by foreclosure and sale, and by giving them the status of general creditors as to any deficiency.[99]

b. Binding Effect of Agreement; Right to Withdraw

In the absence of fraud or concealment, bondholders who have come into a railroad reorganization arrangement are bound by a sale and reorganization thereunder.

Bondholders who have come into a railroad reorganization arrangement, in the absence of fraud or concealment, are bound by a sale and reorganization thereunder,[1] and are not entitled to a rescission of the reorganization agreement after it has been executed by the purchase of the property, the cancellation of the old mortgage, and the payment of a large part of the assumed indebtedness.[2]

Unfair treatment as basis for participation

(1) In equity reorganization of railroad, subsidiaries, and leased lines, where it was not shown that adjustment mortgage bonds had a lien on property securing subsequently issued bonds, adjustment mortgage bonds were not entitled to participate in proposed capitalization of reorganized railroad on ground that they had been unfairly treated in subsequent bond issues—Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. Seaboard Air Line R Co., D C Va, 53 F Supp 672, affirmed, C C.A., Badenhausen v. Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, 145 F.2d 40, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 440, 323 U S. 797, 89 L Ed 636.

(2) Where, at time of appointing receivers in equity reorganization of railroad, money held by paying agents for payment of coupons on adjustment bonds not previously presented for payment was turned over to receivers, denying holders of such bonds any right to such fund was not improper or discriminatory, although court authorized payment of prereceivership coupons of other mortgages which were to be paid in part under reorganization plan, in view of inferior position of mortgage securing adjustment bonds, which precluded its participation in reorganization plan—Blackford v. 2. U.S.—Appeal of Columbus, etc.,

Where the manner of protecting bondholders is a matter of judgment, a plan devised in good faith and assented to by a majority of the bondholders is binding on the others,[3] provided it is fair and just to the minority bondholders;[4] and a minority bondholder will not be permitted to hold up a fair reorganization plan merely as a means for obtaining for himself more favorable terms than those given by the plan,[5] or unless he can show that his legal rights will be impaired by the proposed reorganization.[6]

Right to withdraw. A bondholder who has, in accordance with the reorganization agreement, deposited his bonds with the committee may withdraw them at any time on becoming dissatisfied with the acts of the committee,[7] unless he has agreed either expressly or by necessary implication not to withdraw his bonds for a stipulated period[8] or until after the preparation of the reorganization plan.[9] A provision in the agreement giving the bondholders a right to withdraw after the plan has been submitted does not prevent a dissatisfied bondholder from withdrawing from the agreement and recovering his bonds before a plan has been prepared, where there is no obligation on the committee to prepare any such plan.[10]

Where, however, an agreement containing such a provision requires the committee to prepare a plan of reorganization and give notice thereof, the bondholder has no power to withdraw his bonds until after the plan has been prepared and such notice given;[11] and, in such a case, if the property is foreclosed and the deposited bonds used to purchase at the foreclosure sale without notice to the bondholder and before submission of a plan of reorganization to him, the action of the committee, although it might not be fraudulent or willfully wrong, is not in good faith, and a bondholder deprived of his right to withdraw his bonds by such act may sue the committee to recover damages sustained thereby,[12] in which action the bondholder's measure of damages is the value of the bonds at the date of the violation of the agreement;[13] and, where the bonds had no market value for years, such value may be approximately established by showing the intrinsic value of the property on which they were a first lien,[14] and, when so established, the value of plaintiff's bond is the proper proportion of that amount not exceeding the face of the bond and the unpaid interest.[15] Nevertheless a bondholder who has deposited his bonds subject to the orders of a reorganization committee pending foreclosure is not entitled to withdraw them after they have been deposited with a court to be used in making payment for the property.[16]

Deposit of bonds and acceptance of new bonds. Where the reorganization agreement provides that assenting bondholders shall deposit their bonds with the committee, a bondholder is bound to deliver his bonds to the committee and accept new ones whenever requested to do so;[17] and, where the provision is for such deposit with a designated trust company, a deposit of his bonds with the reorganization committee instead of with the designated depositary entitles a bondholder to participate in the reorganization, since the depositary is merely the agent of the committee.[18] The consummation of such a plan by the deposit of old bonds and the acceptance of bonds of the new company operates as a payment of the old bonds,[19] since the bondholder thereby surrenders all of his rights in respect thereof against the old corporation, its property, and the proceeds of the sale.[20] He has no claim on the proceeds of the sale as an unsecured creditor, to the amount by which the sum realized falls below the amount of such bonds.[21]

c. Operation and Validity of Purchase

Where, in pursuance of a reorganization scheme, railroad property is purchased by a trustee for the bondholders, all of the bondholders who were parties to the scheme ordinarily are, in equity, the owners of the property so purchased as tenants in common.

Where, in pursuance of a reorganization scheme, the railroad property is purchased by a trustee for the bondholders, all the bondholders who were parties to the scheme ordinarily are, in equity, the owners of the property so purchased as tenants in common[22] and stockholders in the new corporation without any formal surrender of their bonds,[23] and are entitled to relief in a suit by one of them, for himself and others similarly situated,[24] and their community of right and interest make it permissible in such case for all the other beneficiaries to come into such suit by intervening petitions[25]

Bondholders purchasing under such an agreement have the equitable right, after satisfying the cost and charges of the litigation and trust, to pay the residue of their bid in bonds,[26] but such a bondholder has no interest in a note given by the new corporation to the trustees in payment of advances made by them for the actual expenses of the execution of the trust, and cannot restrain the trustees from collecting it.[27]

Effect on original trust. Such a purchase does not divest the property of the original trust, but the purchaser will hold it in trust for the bondholders secured by the mortgage or trust deed,[28] which trust may be enforced by a bondholder, even though he has failed to pay his share of the costs and expenses and his bond has been returned to him by the trustee.[29] The property may be followed by the bondholders into the hands of a purchaser from the trustee with knowledge of the trust,[30] and the failure of the scheme under which the purchase was made will not divest or extinguish the trust[31] The failure of some of the cestuis que trust to perform their undertakings with the purchaser will not have any effect on the rights of others who comply with their agreement,[32] nor will their equitable rights be affected by the failure of the trustee properly to apply assessments paid by them.[33]

Where, on such purchase by the trustee, one of the bondholders advances the amount of the bid, and has the sale confirmed and seeks to avail himself of the legal title thus obtained, he will take such title, with all the equitable burdens resting on it, in favor of the other bondholders,[34] and, if he sells and conveys the property in fraud of such trust, he will be required to account for the proceeds to the other bondholders.[35] However, where, in such a case, the sale is made in the interest of all the bondholders, he, as one of the bondholders, is entitled to an equitable interest proportionate to the number of bonds he owns,[36] and if he is compelled to pay more than his share of the expense of receiving the title he will be entitled to contribution from the other bondholders[37]

Consideration. Where a new corporation purchases at foreclosure sale the property of a railroad company, the majority of whose stock it owns, the fact that the purchase price paid is inadequate for the property is immaterial, in the absence of fraud or conspiracy, in a collateral action by a holder of other securities of the railroad company against the purchaser.[38]

d. Rights of Nonparticipating Bondholders

In the absence of statute, a bondholder can claim no right to participate in the reorganization of a railroad where he has refused or failed to come into the scheme or has failed to comply with certain conditions until after the expiration of the specified time.

time, which would entitle him to participate,[40] even though he was ignorant of the agreement until after the expiration of the time fixed, and in such case his only remedy, if any, would be to attack the foreclosure.[41] Where the property is sold under foreclosure proceedings and the title thereto is vested in a trustee who purchases in behalf of the bondholders, a nonparticipating bondholder has no interest in the property,[42] and his only right is to share in the proceeds of the sale,[43] nor can he be forced to come into the new venture, but is entitled to stand on his right to share in the proceeds.[44]

A court of equity will not at the suit of the railroad company compel its minority bondholders to assent to a reorganization scheme which inures solely to the benefit of the stockholders,[45] as where the scheme requires the bondholders to scale their bonds, accepting in lieu thereof new bonds for a smaller amount.[46] However, where, by virtue of statute, a purchase of the road on the application of a number of the bondholders inures to the benefit of all the bondholders, a nonparticipating bondholder has the rights of a tenant in common with the company formed by the other bondholders to the estate and property acquired by the foreclosure, subject to the right of the company to the possession and to receive the income for itself and as trustee for such cotenants.[47] Where a decree of foreclosure directs pro rata payments in cash, by the purchaser, to bondholders who have not elected to join in the purchase, they are not entitled to interest on such payments during the time of delay necessary for determining the amount of the payment.[48]

e. Rights of Other Creditors

(1) In general
(2) As between creditors and stockholders
(3) Securities to creditors

(1) In General

The rights of creditors of a railroad company who have assented to a plan of reorganization are governed by the terms of the plan.

The rights of creditors of a railroad company who have assented to a reorganization plan depend on the terms thereof.[49] Where a court has taken possession of the property in a suit brought in behalf of all the unsecured creditors, and authorized a transfer thereof to a reorganized company pursuant to a plan approved by a large majority of the creditors, the nonassenting minority may be required to accept payment in the same manner as the majority,[50] and a nonassenting creditor may be enjoined from attempting to enforce his claim otherwise than as provided in the decree of reorganization.[51] Where the plan of reorganization offered is insufficient to protect creditors' rights, the court, on an application for confirmation of the foreclosure sale, may make an order protecting such rights.[52]

Compromise of claims
In receivership proceeding wherein plan for reorganization of railway company was proposed, proposed plan compromising claims of unsecured general creditors on basis of cash payment equal to a certain per cent of principal amount of respective claims was fair and equitable to unsecured creditors, without making any provision for an exchange of new securities in satisfaction of claims of unsecured creditors, in view of finding that railway company was hopelessly insolvent and unable to pay its secured indebtedness, thus leaving no equity in insolvent's estate for benefit of unsecured general creditors, and, where offer had been accepted by all but a few of the creditors, offer would be ordered continued in effect for acceptance by those few creditors who had theretofore declined acceptance or who had failed to respond to offer—Chase Nat. Where the proceedings and reorganization are had without notice to unsecured creditors and in fraud of their rights,[53] as where the railroad property is acquired for less than its value by the new company, in which the old stockholders continue as stockholders,[54] such creditors are not bound thereby, and may sue in equity to have the transfer of the property set aside[55] and to have the court formulate a new and just plan of reorganization, provided they offer to abide by such plan.[56] So also a nonassenting, unsecured creditor is not bound by a decree on reorganization which does not protect his rights,[57] as where he is offered, as security, stock, the issuance of which has not been approved by the state public utility commission as required by law;[58] nor in such a case is he estopped to assert his claim against the property by reason of an unfruitful discussion of a settlement between his attorney and officers of the reorganized company[59]

One having a claim for damages for breach of contract by the old company is entitled to all the rights of an unsecured creditor on the reorganization[60] Where claims against the company are purchased by the committee, the fact that a larger amount or per cent is paid to some creditors than to others is immaterial as to the rights under the reorganization plan of creditors whose claims were not purchased.[61]

Against committee. Where at a foreclosure sale a reorganization committee is the highest bidder and the sale to it is confirmed, but it fails to make good its bid and the property is resold for a smaller amount, the general creditors, if they would be benefited thereby, may compel such committee to make good the difference.[62]

Against trust fund. Where the reorganization agreement places funds in the hands of the new company for the payment of unsecured creditors of the old company, who have not participated in or accepted the plan, it constitutes such funds a trust fund for such purposes,[63] and such a creditor may maintain an independent suit against the new company in the nature of a creditor's bill,[64] and need not go into the court under the decree of which the reorganization was effected.[65]

Person furnishing money for reconstruction. Where the mortgage bondholders decline to receive the new bonds because they do not comply with the reorganization contract, a person, who has furnished the money for the reconstruction of the road in reliance for security on the performance of the contract, is entitled to equitable relief for specific performance of the contract, the cancellation of unissued bonds, and an injunction restraining the company from issuing any other bonds without the consent of all the bondholders.[66]

(2) As between Creditors and Stockholders

A plan of reorganization of an insolvent railroad company agreed to by the bondholders and stockholders is not binding on unsecured creditors where it fails to recognize and protect their prior rights against all of the property involved over the rights of the stockholders.

In accordance with the general rule that, as between creditors and stockholders, the property of an insolvent corporation is first appropriated to the payment of its creditors, a plan of reorganization of an insolvent railroad company between the bondholders and stockholders in order to bind a creditor must recognize and adequately protect the prior rights of unsecured creditors against all the property involved, over those of the stockholders,[67] and a plan of reorganization which recognizes and preserves the interest of the stockholders at the expense of the rights of such creditors is invalid as to nonassenting creditors and does not defeat their rights,[68] even though the existence of such creditors was unknown at the time of the reorganization,[69] and whether the reorganization is made by contract or at private sale or consummated by a master's deed under a consent decree.[70] However, this principle does not apply where title to the property of the original company is acquired by purchase on a foreclosure sale, with no agreement or understanding that those interested in the original company are to be benefited directly or indirectly by the reorganization.[71]

Fairness of plan as to creditors. The preservation of creditors' rights is a practical matter,[72] and what constitutes the requisite priority of treatment and fairness of plan depend on the circumstances and necessities of the particular situation,[73] including the amount or character of the insolvent company's outstanding securities, the amount of the unsecured indebtedness, the probable value of the equity in its property beyond secured debts, and the amount of money deemed necessary to insure successful operation of the new company,[74] and can be questioned only by a creditor.[75]

In view of these principles, generally speaking any plan is fair and binding on a creditor which fairly adjudges and secures to him his just and equitable share of the property of the old company,[76] and under which the rights of creditors and stockholders conform to existing practical necessities in such manner as least to disturb the legal priority of the creditors;[77] and creditors who decline a fair offer based on such principles cannot thereafter attack a reorganization as failing to recognize their rights.[78] This does not make it necessary always to pay or offer payment to unsecured creditors in cash before stockholders may retain any interest in the reorganized company;[79] but, when necessary, they may be protected through other arrangements which distinctly recognize their equitable rights to be preferred to stockholders against the full value of all property belonging to the company and which afford each of them the fair opportunity, measured by the existing circumstances, to avail himself of this right.[80]

A plan otherwise fair and valid as to creditors is not rendered invalid by a provision therein that disputed claims of creditors may be litigated;[81] and the mere fact that the plan gives stockholders an interest in the new organization on agreed terms, without including general creditors, or tendering them an opportunity to join therein, does not render it invalid,[82] unless the scheme is one to give to stockholders that which should go to creditors[83] or is one to defraud creditors.[84]

Alternative offers. If a creditor has a free choice of two or more orders under a reorganization plan and either is fair, he cannot complain even if the other or others be patently unfair.[85]

(3) Securities to Creditors

Where the property of a railroad company is in the possession of a court, it is within its power and discretion, in decreeing a reorganization, to adjudge and secure unsecured creditors' interest or shares to them, in the stock, bonds, or other securities of the reorganized company.

though they do not assent to such reorganization.[87] Where the reorganization plan provides for the distribution of securities to the general creditors, it is not necessary that the securities so offered shall be superior in rank or grade to those which the stockholders may obtain,[88] but it will be sufficient to offer the creditors securities of the same grade as those given to stockholders, but of different amounts, where under the circumstances that is all that may reasonably be expected.[89]

If assessments are demanded, they must be adjusted to the purpose of according to the creditor his full right of priority against the corporate assets, as far as possible in the existing circumstances.[90] A plan by which general creditors are given preferred stock and former stockholders are given common stock is not necessarily unfair or unduly preferential.[91]

§ 341. —— Rights of Stockholders

A foreclosure sale of railroad property and a reorganization extinguishes all of the rights of the stockholders of the old company except as may be secured to them by statute or by the decree of foreclosure or reorganization agreement.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the effect of a foreclosure sale of railroad property and reorganization, unless impeached for fraud, is to extinguish all the rights of the stockholders of the old company,[92] and thereafter they have such rights only in the reorganized company as are secured to them by the decree of foreclosure or reorganization agreement[93] or by the governing statutes,[94] as where the statute gives them the right to assent to the reorganization under foreclosure within a specified time.[95]

Where the plan of reorganization is not prohibited by law, a stockholder who takes part therein is estopped, in the absence of fraud, to attack the reorganization as ultra vires,[96] and this rule also applies to a purchaser from such stockholder.[97]

Stockholders not parties to agreement Where, under the terms of a reorganization agreement entered into by the bondholders, without the stockholders being parties thereto, the stockholders in the old company are given the opportunity of acquiring stock in the new company on certain conditions and within a specified time, any privilege of a stockholder in the old company to exchange his stock for stock in the new company does not arise from his original rights as a stockholder, but depends wholly on the provisions of the reorganization agreement under which he is merely a beneficiary,[98] and he must accept or reject the plan as a whole[99] If he refuses or fails to come into the reorganization, or to comply with the conditions within the time specified, he forfeits his rights thereunder,[1] and may not thereafter demand a transfer of new stock on payment of the specified amount[2] or maintain a suit for the modification of the plan[3] Even though he had no notice, he is not entitled to damages for the refusal to give him new stock for his old after such time,[4] since, if the foreclosure sale and reorganization are valid, all his legal rights are cut off,[5] and, if they are invalid, his right to attack the plan is not affected by an arrangement to which he is not a party.[6]

Under such a reorganization a holder of common stock in the original company, who pays an installment of the assessments on his stock but fails, with full knowledge of the facts, to pay the remaining installments when they fall due, loses the privilege to exchange his stock,[7] and no right of redemption remains in him,[8] and the stock to which he would otherwise be entitled is held subject to the rights of the other beneficiaries named in the reorganization agreement.[9] A purchaser from such stockholder, after such default and after the rights of the other beneficiaries have intervened, who purchases for a nominal consideration and with knowledge of the situation, has no rights other than those of his transferor, and is not entitled in law or in equity to compel an exchange of his stock on a tender of the unpaid installments and interest.[10]

Reorganization by stockholders Where a reorganization effected by a majority of the stockholders is unfair or oppressive, a nonparticipating minority stockholder may, in equity, enforce his rights with respect to the property of the old company in the hands of the new company,[11] or he may require the majority stockholders to account as trustees.[12]

§ 342. —— Rights and Liabilities of Reorganized Company

a. In general

b. Liability for debts and obligations of old company

a. In General

A reorganized railroad company after a sale on foreclosure ordinarily succeeds to all the rights, franchises, and privileges of the old company.

In accordance with the rules which govern the rights, powers, property, and liabilities of a reorganized corporation in general, a new or reorganized railroad company after a sale on foreclosure succeeds to all the rights, franchises, and privileges of the old company[12] except such as were granted to the latter company by a special statute,[14] and generally takes the corporate capacity of the company against which the foreclosure proceedings were conducted[15] and is bound to exercise the franchises of its predecessor.[16]

The new company may be subject to statutory regulations enacted subsequent to the giving of the foreclosed mortgage, but prior to the reorganization.[17]

Property. The new company succeeds to all the property and assets of the old company[18] except such as were not covered by the mortgage under which the road was sold[19] and may issue bonds for the property bought.[20] Where the new company has come by the property fraudulently, it cannot, when deprived of its possession, recover for repairs or improvements or for encumbrances paid by it while in possession.[21]

Necessity for transfer. It has been held that, where, under the statutes, the reorganized company is a new corporation as to the ownership of property sold on the foreclosure, the property purchased must be transferred to it.[22] On the other hand, it has been held that, where the statute provides that the new corporation, formed by the purchaser and his associates, shall have all the powers conferred by law on private corporations and the property be subject to the same liabilities in the hands of the new corporation as in the hands of the purchaser, the new corporation becomes the owner of the property held by its organizers on the filing of its charter,[23] without any conveyance from them,[24] and that such ownership is not affected by the fact that the corporation was organized for the purpose of raising money on bonds which failed of realization, since as soon as organized a corporation acquires a legal existence, owes duties fixed by law, and is no longer subject to the will of the organizer.[25]

b. Liability for Debts and Obligations of Old Company

A reorganized railroad company ordinarily is not bound by the debts or obligations of the old company unless liability is assumed by the new company or is imposed by statute or by the decree of foreclosure and sale.

In accordance with the general rule, a reorganized or new railroad company ordinarily is not bound by the debts or obligations of the old company[26] except where the new company has either in express terms or by reasonable implication assumed such debts and obligations,[27] or where this liability is imposed by the statute under which the reorganization takes place,[28] or by the decree of foreclosure and sale,[29] and except where the circumstances are such as to warrant the conclusion that the new company is not a special and distinct company but merely a continuation of the old company, and hence the same person in law.[30]

The new company, however, takes the property subject to the statutory and common-law duties of the old company to the public,[31] such as the duty to maintain general offices, machine shops, etc., at the place where the old company had contracted to keep them.[32] The new company also is liable to account for the railroad property to a holder of bonds of the old company who has not come into the reorganization,[33] but it is not liable for the operation of the road during the time intervening between the purchase and its organization unless its possession during that time is affirmatively shown.[34]

As trust fund. Since the creditors of the old company are entitled to look to its property and assets for the payment of their debts, such property and assets remain liable in the hands of the new company for the debts of the old company, as to such claims as constitute a paramount lien thereon,[35] or where the circumstances are such as to render the transaction a diversion of corporate property as a trust fund, in fraud of unsecured creditors;[36] and mere assent to a plan of reorganization does not bar a creditor from enforcing his claim against the new company where the reorganization agreement to which he has assented does not indicate that stockholders were to be preferred over creditors, as was in fact done,[37] provided he is not barred by laches.[38]

ern the distribution of the proceeds of a foreclosure sale of railroad property.[40] In accordance with such rules, ordinarily the proceeds should be distributed first to the payment of all proper costs and expenses attendant on the foreclosure proceedings and sale,[41] then to the payment of any claims allowed by the court or by statute as superior to the lien of the mortgage or lien foreclosed,[42] and then to the foreclosed mortgage debt,[43] and the surplus, if any, to other lienors or creditors according to their legal priorities,[44] and after them to the mortgagor.[45] The fact that a railroad extending into different states cannot be sold on execution at law and can be reached only by proceedings in equity does not render the proceeds of such a road when sold under foreclosure equitable assets which can be administered irrespective of legal priority.[46]

In administering the property in a foreclosure suit, a court of equity, in its distribution of the surplus income, may prefer unpaid claims for current operating expenses to the claims of bondholders secured by a prior mortgage;[47] and may order that as much of the proceeds as is necessary to pay claimants then before the court shall be used for that purpose, and that the remainder be paid out according to the foreclosure decree.[48] Where, in a suit by a junior lienor to foreclose a mortgage of all the lands, franchises, and property of the railroad, a prior mortgagee of part of the lands intervenes, such mortgagee is not entitled to have the amount of his mortgage paid out of the funds in the hands of the receiver or out of the proceeds of a sale made pursuant to the decree of foreclosure, subject to such mortgage, since such sale passes only the equity of redemption.[49]

Persons entitled to participate. The general rules apply with respect to the persons entitled to participate in the distribution.[50] Where the pro rata amount due on each bond has been calculated and is set apart, undistributed funds allocated to bonds which have not been turned in and owned by persons unknown may not be distributed to other bondholders who had appeared and received their pro rata shares,[51] and where the railroad is sold to bondholders, who receive the property in satisfaction of their bonds, the participating bondholders and other bondholders, who have presented their bonds and received moneys apportioned to them, are not entitled to share in accumulated interest on moneys apportioned to nonparticipating bondholders who have not presented bonds for payment of their proportionate share.[52] Further, the assignee of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, or his trus-

Cost of reconditioning streets
Where railway tracks were laid on land owned by corporation and subsequently streets were created by dedication and user only, and there was no grant of franchise authorizing railroad which subleased the tracts to occupy the streets, and no contract concerning paving and repair of streets, the railroad was not obliged to pave or maintain streets and crossings or to repair them after foreclosure sale and removal of railroad's property, and hence the commonwealth and borough were not entitled to part of proceeds of foreclosure sale to cover cost of reconditioning streets.—Mauch Chunk Nat. tee, is not entitled to participate in moneys apportioned to bondholders who have failed to present their bonds for payment.[53] In such cases the federal statute, 28 U.S.C.A. § 852, directs that where the money has remained on deposit in the registry of the court for at least five years unclaimed by any person it is the duty of the court to cause such money to be deposited in the United States treasury where it is to remain as a permanent appropriation available at all times for the payment of the bonds on appropriate petition to the court,[54] and in view of such statute laches may not fairly be chargeable to the bondholders who have failed to present their bonds.[55] However, it has been held, but not without dissent, that while the purchaser of the railroad or its successor is not entitled to the undistributed fund, it may be ordered paid to the holders of bonds and coupons who had not received full payment on earlier distribution and who, in response to notice, file claims to participate in further distribution.[56]

Where the decree confirming a foreclosure sale fixes the priorities of claims payable out of the proceeds, one who makes no claim at the time of the sale and does not attack the decree of distribution cannot afterward obtain an order authorizing the payment of his claim.[57]

Equal and pro rata distribution. Where several debts or claims are equally entitled to be paid out of the proceeds, they are entitled to share ratably therein;[58] and, accordingly, bondholders joining in a reorganization agreement who have received securities of the reorganized company in exchange for their bonds are entitled to participate in the proceeds of the foreclosure equally with bondholders not joining in the reorganization agreement[59] unless the securities taken in exchange are received in full satisfaction of their claims.[60] Where, after the court has ordered a pro rata distribution among those who have proved their claims, and after some of them have received their proportion, others come in, it is unjust to allow the latter the same proportion in the undistributed balance, but the whole account should be recast at a lower rate, each creditor who had been settled with being required to make a pro rata refund.[61] Where claimant's lien covers only a portion of the road, he is entitled to distribution out of only such proportion of the proceeds of the sale of the entire property as the value of the portion on which his lien exists bears to the value of the entire road.[62]

Diversion of funds. Where the current income of the railroad has been diverted from the payment of current expenses to claims not of this preferential class, leaving claims for current expenses unpaid, the court, on foreclosure, may, from the proceeds of the corpus of the mortgaged property, restore and apply to the payment of unpaid current expenses the amount so diverted,[63] but the amount which may be so restored and applied may not exceed the amount of the diversion.[64] Where, however, there is no diversion by the receiver of income derived from operation to betterments of the property, and the entire income goes into operating expenses and taxes, after which there is no net income but a deficit, which is paid from the proceeds of sale, mechanic's lien claimants are not entitled to an equitable lien on money in the receiver's hands from a sale of the mortgaged property, as against liens of prior mortgagees, suing to foreclose.[65]

The review of foreclosure proceedings on railroad property ordinarily is controlled by the general rules governing review in civil actions and in foreclosure actions.

Diversion to improvement of property

When current income of a railroad company in the hands of a receiver is diverted to the improvement of the property by the receiver, and debts for operating expenses are not paid, provision should be made, in foreclosing a mortgage on the property, for the payment of such debts out of the proceeds of the sale of the property.

regulate the review of foreclosure proceedings on railroad property.[66] As a general rule the appeal brings up nothing but errors legally assigned, and the review will be restricted to the specific questions thus pointed out and designated for review.[67] The appellate court will not review decisions on points resting wholly in the discretion of the lower court, unless an abuse of such discretion is shown;[68] nor will it review such errors as have been waived or acquiesced in by the parties concerned.[69] It will not review an alleged error with respect to the property in a railroad foreclosure suit, and the allowance of amounts due to holders of mortgage bonds, if the evidence presented before the master is not brought before it, and if no objection to the proof was taken below.[70]

Where the record on appeal is too meager for the appellate court to determine whether there was error in the decree, such decree must be affirmed[71] or the appeal dismissed.[72] General creditors are not injured by a release of errors by the trustee in an action in which an adjudication that the property had become vested in another corporation was had, where it appears that the company was hopelessly insolvent and that under no circumstances could the general creditors receive anything out of the assets.[73]

A supersedeas will not be granted on an appeal from an order confirming a foreclosure sale, where the main decree was not superseded on appeal therefrom.[74]

§ 345. Fees and Costs

The fees and costs in foreclosure proceedings of railroad property ordinarily are regulated by the rules governing fees and costs in foreclosure proceedings generally.

General rules governing fees and costs in foreclosure proceedings ordinarily apply in foreclosure proceedings of railroad property.[75] Allowances may properly be made from the fund realized on foreclosure to compensate counsel for services rendered for the common benefit in preserving or protecting the railroad property,[76] particularly where provision therefor is made in the foreclosed mortgage.[77] The amount of the allowances is largely within the discretion of the court and its decision will not be reversed unless an abuse of discretion is shown by the allowance of an entirely unwarranted or excessive fee.[78] In determining the amount, consideration is to be given to the nature, extent, and difficulty of the services rendered, the amount involved, and other pertinent circumstances of the case.[79]

Counsel, however, who appear and represent the individual interests of particular parties do not come within this rule,[80] although it is within the discretion of the court to allow compensation to attorneys representing a bondholder not participating in a reorganization to be a charge against the entire fund available for the payment of all such nonparticipating bondholders.[81] No allowance can be made for counsel representing the mortgagor where the fund realized is insufficient to pay the mortgages,[82] and, where the foreclosure and sale results in a surplus remaining over and above the mortgage indebtedness, the fees of counsel representing the bondholders will be charged against the latter's share of the proceeds and not against the fund as a whole.[83]

Allowance should, in a proper case, be made for a sheriff's or other officer's fees or compensation,[84] and for reasonable compensation to a master appointed in the foreclosure suit.[85]

§ 346. Operation and Effect

The foreclosure of a railroad mortgage cuts off all the rights and interests of the railroad company in the mortgaged property.

In the absence of statute, providing otherwise, the foreclosure of a railroad mortgage will cut off all the rights and interests of the railroad company in the mortgaged property,[86] and nothing will be left for the general creditors or stockholders except their interest in any surplus after the mortgage is satisfied.[87]

§ 347. Redemption

a. In general
b Rights of creditors
c. Bar or waiver of right
d. Actions for redemption

a. In General

The redemption of mortgaged railroad property ordinarily is governed by the rules regulating the redemption of mortgaged property generally.

General rules governing redemption in the case of mortgages ordinarily are applicable with respect to the redemption of mortgaged railroad property.[88] A mortgagor company and those succeeding to its title, or any person having a title or interest in the mortgaged premises which would be prejudiced by a foreclosure, is entitled to redeem the railroad property from the lien or mortgage existing against it.[89] Although a right of redemption from a foreclosure sale exists while the trustees are in possession of the road and operating it for the benefit of bondholders,[90] or at any time prior to the confirmation of the sale, by bringing into court the amount due and costs,[91] in the absence of a statute to the contrary a valid foreclosure and sale, duly confirmed, extinguishes the equity of redemption[92] except as to persons whose rights have not been adjudicated in the foreclosure proceedings,[93] and the only remedy in such a case, if any, is by a suit to vacate the decree.[94] In some jurisdictions, however, a statutory right to redeem is given under which a specified time is generally allowed for redemption before the decree or sale is made final,[95] although, even in such jurisdictions, a general statute applying to redemption of land in ordinary cases does not apply in case of a railroad foreclosure.[96] A right to redeem from the sale may also be given by the decree of foreclosure,[97] the time allowed for redemption being a matter for the sound discretion of the court.[98]

pany is entitled, after surrender of the property to the state to which it has been mortgaged, cannot be enforced by a suit against the state in its own courts.[99] Where a railroad company, which has the apparent legal title to the equity of redemption of a mortgage on another road, held and operated by the mortgage trustees, has paid off and canceled part of the mortgage and stands ready to pay off the balance, it is entitled to possession pending a suit by stockholders of the mortgagor company to render void such apparent legal title [1]

b. Rights of Creditors

A judgment creditor of the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption has a right to redeem, provided he does so in the mode prescribed by statute.

A judgment creditor of the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption has a right to redeem, provided he does so in the mode prescribed by statute [2] Where a railroad company owning equities of redemption in the roads of two former companies consolidated to form it is merged by consolidation into another company by proceedings which fix on its property a lien in favor of its creditors, such lien is one on the separate equities of redemption, and the lienors have the same right of separate redemption from the mortgages as the railroad company.[3]

Where a railroad company's right to redemption from a sale on foreclosure of certain liens has become barred, the holders of other outstanding liens who had not been made parties to the first proceedings are not entitled to another sale of the property, but are only entitled to a decree allowing them a reasonable time to redeem.[4] Where the legal title to a railroad has been acquired by the holders of certain liens thereon, they are entitled to maintain a bill of strict foreclosure to cut off the equity and right of junior encumbrancers to redeem.[5]

c. Bar or Waiver of Right

A right to redeem railroad property may be waived or barred by a long and unreasonable delay in asserting the right.

In accordance with the rules regulating the bar or waiver of rights of redemption generally, a right to an equity of redemption may be waived or barred by a long and unreasonable delay in asserting the right, amounting to laches, which is not attributable to ignorance, and which is not explained or sufficiently excused,[6] or by any declarations or conduct on the part of the person entitled to the right, which amounts to a positive and definite relinquishment or surrender of the right;[7] or it may be barred by his failure to redeem within the time limited by the decree of foreclosure.[8]

d. Actions for Redemption

Actions to enforce the right of redemption in foreclosures of railroad property ordinarily are governed by the rules regulating actions to enforce the right of redemption in mortgage foreclosures generally.

The general rules governing actions to enforce the right of redemption in mortgage foreclosures ordinarily are applicable in actions to enforce the right of redemption in foreclosures of railroad property,[9] with respect to the parties to the suit[10] and the pleadings.[11] A bill in equity against a corporation in possession, to redeem the property of the mortgagor corporation from the mortgage, must allege that defendant corporation in possession has some title in the mortgaged property[12] and is not a mere trespasser,[13] or must aver information and belief of such fact.[14] It must also allege a formal offer to pay what may be found due.[15]

X. COMPANIES AND PERSONS LIABLE FOR INJURIES

§ 348. In General

A railroad company is liable for wrongful or negligent acts or omissions of its agents or employees within their authority, and for injuries resulting from a breach of statutory duty, and generally cannot, without legislative exemption, terminate its liability by transfer of the operation of the road to another.

It is well settled that a railroad company is liable for the wrongful or negligent acts or omissions of its agents or employees within the scope of their express or implied authority,[16] although its entire capital stock is owned by another company[17] or although the agent is another railroad;[18] and it is equally well settled that as a general rule a railroad company cannot, by a transfer of the operation of its road to another, terminate its further liability unless relieved therefrom by legislative exemption, express or implied.[19]

A railroad which takes possession of and uses a road not constructed by it, while not responsible for defects occasioning injury before such time,[20] is responsible for injuries thereafter occasioned by its defective condition,[21] where it has, or should have had, knowledge thereof.[22]

Continuing statutory duties,[23] such as the duty to restore a public highway to its former condition or to such state as not unnecessarily to have impaired its usefulness,[24] or to maintain a highway crossing,[25] are regarded as inseparable from the franchise to operate the railroad, and a railroad which subsequently becomes vested with the property and privileges of the road is also burdened with the duty and liable for injuries resulting from a breach thereof, and, in order to impose such liability, notice to it of its failure to perform the statutory duty is unnecessary.[26]

Partnership between railroads. The relationship between two railroad companies may be such as to constitute a partnership with the liabilities ordinarily incident to that relationship.[27]

Agency of government; ownership by state. Notwithstanding all of the stock of a railroad corporation is owned by the United States government, which controls its operations, if the intention of the government to preserve the existence of the owner as a private corporation is apparent, it may be liable to suit by a private individual for injury occasioned by the negligence of its employees.[28] By force of statute, the same rules which are applicable to the duty of railroads generally are applicable, by the consent of the state, to a railroad which is the property of the state.[29]

Guaranty of bonds of one railroad by another to aid in the construction of the road of the former does not make the former the servant or agent of the guarantor, rendering the guarantor liable for its negligence or default.[30]

A company having a mere easement over land on which an injury occurred, and no control over the instrumentality involved in the injury, has been held not liable therefor.[31]

Elimination of grade crossing; liability of city. Owners of a building damaged by negligence in excavation in connection with the elimination of a grade crossing have been held not relegated to a claim against the highway commission for damages as for the taking of their property,[32] but to be entitled to sue the company contracting with the commission, as well as the city which employed another contractor,[33] but in particular circumstances the city has been held not liable for injury to property because of the negligence of another company after the contractor employed by the city completed the principal part of his work.[34]

§ 349. Railroad Holding Stock or Bonds of Another Railroad; Control

One railroad company is not liable for the torts of another merely because it controls such other or owns all or a majority of the stock or bonds thereof; but it may be liable if, by stock ownership, it operates and manages such other company.

One railroad company does not become liable for the torts of another merely by reason of its ownership of the stock[35] or bonds[36] thereof, although it may be a connecting line,[37] and even though the former company controls the latter.[38] So, a railroad which holds the majority of the stock of another is not for that reason liable for its torts,[39] even though by such stock ownership it controls the corporate organization thereof[40] and has the same general officers,[41] or because of such ownership has entered into close traffic agreements therewith.[42]

Where, however, by stock ownership, one company actually controls, operates, and manages another railroad, it may be liable for the acts of the servants or agents thereof,[43] and the rule will apply where the relationship between the dominant and subsidiary company constitutes a partnership, or a joint and several agency, even though the general management of each road is retained by the company owning it.[44] On a like principle a lessee of a railroad owning all the stock in a subsidiary company may be liable for the acts or omissions of such subsidiary company where by reason of such lease it controls and operates it.[45]

§ 350. Mortgagees and Trustees in Possession

In the absence of authorizing statute, a railroad company cannot, by voluntarily surrendering its road to a mortgagee or trustee of its own selection, escape liability for negligence in the operation of the road.

It is usually held, in the absence of statute authorizing it, that a railroad company cannot, by the voluntary surrender of its road to a mortgagee or trustee of its own selection, under a mortgage deed of trust for the benefit of creditors or bondholders, escape liability for negligence in the operation of the road.[46] In such case the trustee must be deemed to be the agent of the company,[47] and the action may be maintained against the railroad company,[48] or suit may be brought against the trustees in their official capacity,[49] or the trustee may be held personally liable in the same manner as a lessee or other person in possession and control and exercising for the time being the franchises of the company[50]

Where a statute authorizes the surrender of a railroad to mortgagees or trustees for the benefit of creditors,[51] or where the possession of the mortgagee or trustee is adverse to the railroad and the result of proceeding in invitum,[52] it has been held that the property in the hands of such trustees is liable for the negligent management of the road by them resulting in injury, and an action may be maintained against them,[53] and the company will not be liable[54]

Fencing. Trustees or mortgagees in possession of a railroad are subject to a statutory liability for injuries to animals due to the unfenced condition of the road,[55] and this rule applies to a corporation operating a railroad as trustee for another[56] or for bondholders.[57]

Fires. Trustees or mortgagees in possession of and operating a railroad are subject to a statutory liability for fires,[58] unless the liability of the trustee is expressly defined and limited by statute, and does not include such liability.[59]

a. General rules
b. Where lessor retains control
c. Where road operated in name or interest of lessor
d. Where lessee assumes liability

a. General Rules

Some decisions broadly hold a lessor railroad company liable for the lessee's torts; where the lease is unauthorized, the lessor remains liable for the lessee's torts in operating the road, and where it is authorized the authorities differ as to the lessor's liability.

In a number of cases it has been held broadly, without express reference to whether or not the lease was authorized, that a lessor railroad company is liable for the torts of the lessee in the operation of the road,[60] the decisions being based on the theory

Joint duty
The duty of operating railroad with due care for safety of the public is owed jointly by railway lessee and railway lessor.—Hawley v. Davenport, R. I. & N. W. Ry. Co., Iowa, 45 N.W.2d 513—Sorenson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 168 N.W. 313, 183 Iowa 1123.

that the lessee is the agent of the lessor.[61] It has been held that the lessor can be relieved of its duty to operate with due care for the safety of the public only by an unequivocal legislative release [62]

Where lease authorized Where there is legislative authority for the execution of the lease, but no express provision as to the subsequent liability of the lessor, there are directly conflicting lines of authority as to the lessor's liability for the torts of the lessee.[63] Some of the decisions hold that the authority to lease implies an exemption from liability on the part of the lessor for the torts of the lessee,[64] especially where the lessor retains no control over the operation of the road,[65] unless the contract itself reserves continuing liability in the lessor.[66] Other decisions hold that the lessor is not relieved from liability unless there is an express provision to this effect in the legislative authority,[67] and even though the lessor has no control over the operation and management of the lines.[68] Still other cases make a distinction between injuries growing out of negligence in the running of trains or the general management of the road over which the lessor could exercise no control and injuries due to the omission of duties owing to the public which are imposed primarily on the lessor,[69] holding that, in the absence of statutory exemption, an authorized lease impliedly relieves the lessor from liability for injuries of the former kind[70] but not for injuries of the latter kind.[71]

Where the lessor is liable for the negligence of the lessee, such liability applies to an injury occurring at a point beyond the limits of the leased road, on the track of another company, where the license to use such track was acquired by the lessor and was derived by the lessee through the lease.[72]

Liability of a lessor for injuries arising from operation of the road by his lessee does not apply where the lessor is obligated by statute to permit a joint use of its tracks with others,[73] especially where the operating agreement provides that each company shall be liable only for the negligence of its own servants.[74]

Where lease unauthorized. If the lease is unauthorized, the lessor company will remain liable for the torts of the lessee in the operation of the road,[75] but not for torts committed by the lessee in carrying on a separate and distinct,[76] even though similar,[77] business.

On expiration of lease, the road reverts to the lessor in the condition in which it then is, and its opera-

The reasoning is that in the absence of such exemption the lessor is estopped to set up the lease as a defense and so release itself from liability for the negligence of its lessee, since it would be against public policy to allow a railroad corporation to put off the liability incident to its franchise while enjoying the profits that may accrue by the medium of a lease

tion will be subject to any statutory duty or burden imposed during the time of its operation by the lessee.[78]

Release of lessee as discharging lessor. Where the lessee acknowledges liability and makes settlement for an injury inflicted, the lessor is thereby discharged, since the lessor is responsible only under the doctrine of respondeat superior.[79]

Term "operation of a railway," as used in a lease relieving the lessor railway company of all claims for loss or damage arising from such operation, requires much more than the mere movement of trains or engines,[80] and includes everything necessary to permit trains and engines to move, such as the repair and maintenance of bridges, tracks, and buildings.[81]

b. Where Lessor Retains Control

A lessor railroad company retaining control over the operation of the road is liable for injuries resulting therefrom.

Regardless of the effect of a lease in ordinary cases, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, if a lessor railroad company retains control over the operation of the road it will be liable for injuries resulting from such operation.[82]

c. Where Road Operated in Name or Interest of Lessor

Where a railroad is being operated by the lessee in the name or interest of the lessor, the latter is liable for injuries occurring in the operation.

The lessor company is liable for injuries occurring in the operation of its railroad by the lessee where the road is being operated in the name,[83] or wholly in the interest,[84] of the lessor company.

d. Where Lessee Assumes Liability

Where the lessor railroad company would otherwise be liable for the acts of the lessee, such liability as to third persons is not affected by any covenant in the lease or contract between the companies by which the lessee agrees to perform the duties and obligations of the lessor, or to indemnify the lessor for any liabilities incurred by reason of the acts of the lessee.

Where the lessor railroad company would otherwise be liable for the acts of the lessee, under the principles discussed supra subdivision a of this section, such liability as to third persons is not affected by any covenant in the lease or contract between the companies by which the lessee agrees to perform the duties and obligations of the lessor, or to indemnify the lessor for any liabilities incurred by reason of the acts of the lessee,[85] unless such provisions have the support of legislative authority.[86] A covenant by a lessee of land from a railroad company to assume all risks of damage or loss to property brought upon or in proximity to the premises has been held valid.[87]

An exemption clause in an industrial track agreement made by a third person with a lessee, who has agreed to indemnify his lessor, has been held to be a bar in an action against the lessor by such third person for injury occasioned by the negligence of the lessee.[88]

§ 353. —— Liability of Lessee in General

The lessee of a railroad is liable for its own negligence in operating the road; and, where a valid lease is regarded as exempting the lessor from liability, the lessee is solely liable. The lessee cannot avoid liability to third persons by any agreement with the lessor.

A lessee railroad company is liable for its own negligence or that of its servants in the operation of the leased railroad,[89] but is not liable for torts committed by the lessor company prior to the execution of the lease,[90] unless, it has been held, it has assumed such liability under the terms of the lease.[91] Likewise, the lessee is not liable for the negligence of employees of the lessor over whom it exercises no control.[92] Where, under the local law, the lessor is regarded as exempted from liability in case of a duly authorized lease, as discussed supra § 352 a, the lessee is solely liable,[93] and to the same extent as though operating the road as owner.[94]

The lessee cannot avoid its liability as to third persons by any contract or agreement with the lessor,[95] even where under the local law the lessor also is liable,[96] nor can the lessee escape liability by denying the validity of the lease;[97] nor can the lessee claim, as to its operation of the leased road, the benefit of any special exemptions from liability contained in its own charter.[98]

Discrimination as to sidings. Where, after a lease, a person becomes entitled to the construction of a siding, the right of action for damages for unlawful discrimination in refusing the siding is against the lessee[99] and not the lessor.[1]

Negligence of independent contractor. The lessee is also liable for injuries due to the negligence of the servants of an independent contractor, where such contractor is exercising any of the charter powers and franchises of the company with its assent.[2]

§ 354. —— Injuries Due to Defective Roadbeds, Tracks, Etc.

a. Liability of lessor
b. Liability of lessee

a. Liability of Lessor

During operation by a lessee railroad company, the lessor is generally liable for injuries due to the condition of the track, roadbed, or appurtenances thereto, but not for the negligence of the lessee in making repairs or alterations.

The general rule, in the absence of statute providing otherwise, is that the lessor railroad company can be held liable for injuries, during operation by the lessee, due to the condition of its track or its roadbed or appurtenances thereto,[3] even though the lessee may also be liable,[4] and even under circumstances where it is conceded that it would not be liable for negligence of the lessee in the operation of its trains.[5] On the other hand, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, the lessor is not liable for injuries growing out of the negligence of the lessee in making repairs or alterations upon the leased road,[6] notwithstanding the lessor is bound under the terms of the lease to compensate the lessee for the cost of such work,[7] and although it would be liable if such defects existed at the time the lease was executed and possession given,[8] and were continued in such condition even through the fault or negligence of the lessee.[9]

b. Liability of Lessee

A lessee railroad company is liable for injuries from its acts in repairing or altering the leased road, failing to maintain it in proper condition, or continuing, after notice to abate, a nuisance created by the lessor; but authorities are not uniform as to the liability of the lessee for injuries due to the original construction of the road.

A lessee railroad company has been held liable for injuries occurring during its operation of the road

due to the defective condition of the track or roadbed, although such defects were in the original construction or existed at the time of the lease,[10] since it cannot keep and maintain the tracks or roadbed in a dangerous condition and escape liability for injury arising out of such condition[11] on the ground that it is the duty of the lessor to keep the tracks in proper order;[12] but it has also been held that the lessee is not liable for injuries to property due to the original construction of the road by the lessor.[13] The lessee is liable for injuries resulting from its own acts in making repairs or alterations upon the leased road,[14] or its failure to perform its continuing duty to maintain the road in suitable and proper condition.[15]

Under an ordinance requiring railroads to fence their roads, when and as prescribed by the certain municipal officers, a lessee is not liable for an injury resulting from a failure to fence, in the absence of a notice to it to fence the road, where it is not responsible under the lease for the maintenance, repair, and renewal of the property,[16] even though notice had been given its lessor.[17]

Where the lease provides that during the term the lessee will do and perform all acts which in the absence of such lease the law would impose on the lessor, the lessee must construct farm crossings which are required by statute.[18]

Continuing nuisance. Where a lessee continues a nuisance created by its lessor in the construction or maintenance of the road, after notice to abate it, it will be liable for resulting damages,[19] even though the nuisance was created by its lessor in an attempt to abate another nuisance of which complaint was made.[20]

§ 355. —— Injuries to Shippers

A railroad company has been held liable for the negligence or other wrongful conduct of its lessee resulting in loss to a shipper.

It has been held that a railroad company is liable for the negligence of its lessee causing loss or delay in transit of shipments of goods[21] or live stock,[22] and for a refusal of the lessee to transport goods on demand,[23] or to deliver goods to the consignee.[24] The lessor, however, is bound to do no more than its lessee,[25] and, where bound by the contract of shipment, it is protected thereby and is entitled to any proper exemption from, or limitation of, liability provided for therein,[26] and is entitled to the benefit of a stipulation limiting the liability to losses on its own line.[27]

§ 356. —— Injuries to Employees

Authorities differ as to whether a lessor railroad company is liable for injuries to the employees of the lessee arising out of the operation of the road by the latter.

The authorities are not in accord on the question of the liability of a lessor railroad company for injuries to employees arising out of its lessee's operation of the road.[28] Thus in some jurisdictions it has been held that the lessor is liable for the consequences of the negligence of the lessee in the operation of the road to the employees of the lessee,[29] who, as to the lessor, are considered as part of the general public,[30] especially where the employees had no notice of the lease,[31] and notwithstanding the injury was not due to a defect in the road but solely to negligence in the operation of the trains;[32] but in other jurisdictions it has been held that the lessor is not liable where the injury to such an employee was received in the line of services required of him in operating the road, and were caused solely by the negligence of the lessee[33] in the management of the road[34] or in failure to furnish suitable appliances,[35] and although there is no express statutory exemption from such liability[36] unless its negligence concurred with that of the lessee.[37] There is a similar conflict even under statutes expressly providing that the lessor shall remain liable as though it operated the road itself, it being held under some that the provision applies to injuries to employees of the lessee,[38] and under others that the provision applies only to the duties of the company as a common carrier to the public and not to injuries to employees due to the negligence of the lessee.[39]

The lessee's liability for injuries to its employees is discussed in Master and Servant § 178.

Defects in roadbed or other property. Following the general rule stated supra § 354 a, the lessor is liable for injuries to the lessee's employees due to structural defects in the road as constructed by the lessor or due to its failure properly to maintain it under its public duty to do so,[40] as, for example, injuries resulting from its failure to maintain in a reasonably safe condition its tracks[41] or station houses,[42] especially where the lease is void[43] or without statutory authority.[44]

§ 357. —— Injuries to Animals

a. In general
b. Arising from failure to fence or erect cattle guards

a. In General

Both the lessor railroad company and the lessee have been held liable for injuries to animals caused by the latter's negligence.

Where a railroad lease was unauthorized, the lessor railroad company will be liable for injuries to animals caused by the negligence of its lessee.[45] Even where the lease is authorized, the lessor has been held liable for such injuries.[46]

A lessee company, owing the same degree of care as its lessor to prevent injuries to stock, is similarly liable for failure to exercise such care,[47] including its failure to abate a continuing nuisance.[48]

b. Arising from Failure to Fence or Erect Cattle Guards

A railroad company leasing its road to another remains liable for injuries resulting from its failure to comply with statutory requirements as to fences and cattle guards; and the lessee is liable to the same extent

Where a statute imposes on a railroad company liability for injuries to animals caused by its failure to comply with a statute requiring it to fence its right of way and erect adequate cattle guards, it cannot escape liability by leasing its road to another company,[49] even though the lease is authorized[50] and by its terms binds the lessee to discharge all statutory liability imposed on the lessor company,[51] and the lessor may also be held liable for injuries due to defects occurring in, or from failure to keep in repair, such fences or cattle guards.[52] Where, however, a lessee goes into possession under a lease before the road is opened for use, and the statute requires fences to be erected prior to such time by every railroad, lessee, or other person in possession, the lessor company will not be liable for injuries to animals arising out of the failure of the lessee to erect such fences.[53]

The lessee is subject to the same liability as the lessor for injuries due to the absence of fences or cattle guards,[54] or a failure to keep those constructed in repair,[55] but only to the same extent.[56] In some instances the statutes imposing the duty or liability apply in terms to lessees.[57] The lessee company cannot avoid its liability by any contract or agreement with the lessor;[58] nor is it material with respect to the lessee whether or not the lease was authorized.[59]

§ 358. —— Fires

a. Liability of lessor
b. Liability of lessee

a. Liability of Lessor

A railroad company which has entered into an unauthorized lease of its property has been held liable for fires caused by the negligence of its lessee, but, in the absence of a statutory liability, the authorities differ as to the liability of the lessor where the lease is authorized.

A railroad company which has entered into an unauthorized lease of its road has been held liable for fires caused by the negligence of its lessee.[60] Where the lease is authorized, it has been held that such authority impliedly exempts the lessor from liability,[61] but it has also been held that the lessor is liable unless there is an express legislative exemption.[62]

Under a statute making a lessor responsible for any cause of action arising out of the operation of the road, it has been held that the lessor is liable for the negligence of its lessee causing fires,[63] but not to the user of an industrial track who has agreed to indemnify the lessee for all damages occasioned by the negligence of lessee's servants and employees.[64] Where a statute imposes a liability for all damages by fire communicated by locomotives, a lessor company making an authorized lease will be liable for fires so communicated by its lessee where the statute authorizing the lease provides that it shall remain liable on all actions growing out of the operation of the road;[65] and the lessor has been held liable where the authority to lease contained no such reservation but did not contain an express exemption.[66] Under statutes providing that every railroad company should be liable for all damages caused by fires communicated by "its" locomotives, it has been held that the lessor is not liable for fire communicated by engines of its lessee,[67] although there is also authority to the contrary.[68]

The lessor, although the lease is authorized, is liable under a statute imposing a liability on all railroads for damages by fire due to a failure to keep their rights of way clear of combustible matter.[69]

b. Liability of Lessee

A lessee railroad company is subject to statutory liability for fires, as well as to liability for fires caused by its negligent operation.

In accordance with the general rule that a lessee of a railroad is liable for its own negligence and that of its servants in the operation of the road, as discussed supra § 353, a lessee company will be liable for fires caused by the negligent operation of its locomotives.[70] So, where a railroad leases an elevator and operates it as a facility of its railroad, it will be liable for fire communicated because of negligence in the operation of the elevator.[71]

Under a statute imposing liability for fires communicated by locomotives or engines, without regard to negligence, the lessee is subject to the statutory liability for damage by fire communicated by one of its locomotives used upon the tracks.[72]

§ 359. —— Statutory Liability

Statutory provisions may impose on a lessor railroad company responsibility for the liabilities of the lessee, and vice versa.

Responsibility for the liabilities of the lessee railroad company is expressly imposed on the lessor in some jurisdictions by constitutional[73] or statutory[74] provisions; and statutes so providing are constitutional.[75] On the other hand, responsibility for liabilities of the lessor may by statute be transferred to the lessee,[76] or the lessee may be made liable for the same causes, and in the same manner, as though operating its own road.[77]

Statutes imposing such liability are not broad enough to impose liability for the torts of a stranger who seizes and operates the road against the consent of both lessor and lessee,[78] even though the seizure and operation be by a receiver of the lessee company.[79]

A terminal company created under a statute relating to railroads generally, where there is no special statute providing for its incorporation, has been held to be "a railroad company," and as such liable under a statute imposing liability on a lessor for the acts of its lessee,[80] unless the legislative intent to release it from such responsibility is clearly manifest.[81]

An intra-state railroad which leases its road to one doing an interstate business, if under a local statute it is responsible for the lessor's acts, will be liable for such acts whether they occur in intra-state or interstate commerce.[82]

Where there is statutory authority for a lease, a company acting on such authority is bound by any conditions thereof imposing liability.[83]

§ 360. —— Lease for Other than Railroad Purposes

A railroad company leasing part of its property for a lawful purpose other than railroad use and reserving no supervision or control over the premises is not liable for the negligence of its lessee in maintaining the premises in a defective condition where there is no causal connection between the lease and the injury; but it may be liable to the lessee for negligence.

Where a railroad company leases part of its property for a lawful purpose other than railroad use, and reserves no supervision or control over the premises, it will not be liable for the negligence of its lessee in maintaining the premises in a defective condition[84] where there is no causal connection between the lease and the injury complained of,[85] and even if leasing for such use is unauthorized;[86] nor is there any imposition of liability on such a lessee for any lawful or proper use of the leased premises.[87]

The lessor remains liable for injuries to the lessee caused by negligence of the lessor in the operation of its road,[88] notwithstanding the lease in terms attempts to relieve the lessor from liability for such negligence.[89]

§ 361. Consolidated and Constituent Companies

Where two railroad companies are legally consolidated, the new company ordinarily is liable for the torts of such companies committed before the consolidation, and for injuries occurring thereafter due to the defective condition of the roadbed, etc., constructed by one of such companies or to the continuation of a nuisance originally created by one company.

Ordinarily it is held that, where two railroad companies are legally consolidated, the new company succeeds to all the rights and liabilities of each of the constituent companies, and is liable for the torts of such companies committed prior to the consolidation,[90] notwithstanding the statute authorizing the consolidation preserves the separate identity of the constituent companies with respect to their existing liabilities,[91] and such liability may be enforced directly by an action at law against the new company.[92] So also, the new company will be liable for injuries occurring after the consolidation due to the defective condition of the roadbed, bridges, or culverts constructed by one of the constituent companies[93] or to the continuance of a nuisance originally created by one of the constituent companies,[94] and the succeeding company is alone liable for the injuries resulting from any new work of construction or repair done by it thereafter.[95]

Responsibility for the liabilities of the constituent companies may be imposed by the statutes authorizing the consolidation,[96] or expressly assumed by the articles of consolidation[97] or by the conveyances to it,[98] but exists independently of any express provision to this effect and as a legal result of the consolidation.[99]

The constituent companies cannot by any contract between themselves affect the right of persons who have been injured by their torts;[1] and, where a railroad company has made an ineffectual attempt to consolidate with another, it is liable for an injury due to the negligence of the persons operating the road by virtue of the attempted consolidation.[2]

§ 362. Selling or Purchasing Company

a. Injuries prior to sale
b. Injuries subsequent to sale

a. Injuries Prior to Sale

The purchaser of the property of a railroad company at an authorized and bona fide sale takes it free of pre-existing liabilities growing out of the negligence of, or improper operation by, the vendor, or for injuries caused by the construction or maintenance of the road, unless such liability is expressly assumed or is imposed by statute.

On an authorized and bona fide sale of the property of a railroad company, the purchaser takes the property free from preëxisting liabilities growing out of the negligence of or improper operation of the road by, the vendor,[3] or because of injuries to, or trespasses upon, property occurring prior to the purchase and caused by the construction or maintenance of the road,[4] unless such liability is expressly assumed[5] or is imposed by statute;[6] but for this result the sale must be a bona fide and valid one and not a mere consolidation or change of name.[7] It has been held that a contract between the companies by which the purchasing company agrees to assume the debts and liabilities of the other does not confer any right on a third person to sue the purchasing company in tort on an unliquidated claim existing against the other company.[8]

The selling road remains liable for injuries occasioned prior to the sale and during its operation of the road.[9]

b. Injuries Subsequent to Sale

After a railroad company validly sells its road and franchise, and surrenders possession and control, it is not liable for subsequent injuries from operation by the purchaser; the latter is liable for injury resulting from its continuation of an improper condition with knowledge thereof, or from omission of a continuing statutory duty.

After an authorized and otherwise valid sale of its road and franchise by a railroad company, it is not liable for subsequent injuries due to the negligent or improper operation of the road by the purchasing company, to which it has surrendered the possession and control;[10] nor is this rule affected by the fact that the sale was not registered or that the property continued to be assessed in the name of the former owner.[11] The succeeding company is liable for injuries resulting after its acquisition of the road due to the manner in which it was constructed by its predecessor, if it continues to use the road in its defective or improper condition,[12] with knowledge thereof,[13] such notice or knowledge ordinarily being regarded as necessary,[14] or where it continues a nuisance created by the vendor[15] unless the nuisance was on other property not belonging to, or under the control of, the railroad company,[16] and also for damages due to any acts on its own part with respect to the construction, alteration, or repair of the road.[17] Accordingly, the purchaser may be liable for fire communicated through combustible material allowed to accumulate on the right of way by its vendor[18] Where the original construction is not improperly or negligently done, no cause of action arises against the purchasing company in favor of a successor in title of the original landlord, through whose land the road was constructed.[19]

Continuing statutory duty. A purchasing company will be liable for injuries occurring after the purchase due to the omission of a general statutory duty of a continuing character, although it should have been performed by its predecessor, such as a failure to restore a highway,[20] to provide culverts and sluices necessary for natural drainage.[21] to erect and maintain fences,[22] or to keep watercourses free from obstruction.[23]

Invalid sale. Where a railroad attempts to sell its road to another company which is not authorized to purchase it, it is not relieved from liability for injuries to third persons occasioned by the operation of the road by such company.[24]

§ 363. Purchaser at Foreclosure or Judicial Sale

The purchaser of the property of a railroad company at a foreclosure sale is not liable for injuries occurring prior thereto while the mortgagor or a receiver was in possession except where a statute or the decree under which the sale is had provides otherwise; but the purchaser is liable for continuing, with notice, a previously created nuisance or failing to perform a continuing duty.

After a judicial sale of its property, a railroad company is not liable for injuries arising from the operation of the road by the purchaser.[25] In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary,[26] the purchaser at a foreclosure sale is not liable for injuries occurring prior thereto while the road was in the possession of the mortgagor or of a receiver[27] except that liability may be imposed on the purchaser at a foreclosure or other judicial sale by the terms of the decree under which the sale is had,[28] which liability can be enforced only in accordance with the terms and conditions of such order.[29] A decree requiring the purchaser at a foreclosure to pay all liabilities incurred by receivers in operating the road has been held to include such liabilities as for damages recoverable for personal injuries,[30] wrongful death,[31] and liability under a statute for failure to maintain lateral drains.[32]

Where the sale is not made subject to claims against the sold-out road or the receiver, the purchaser will not be liable on a cause of action accruing after the sale, but before confirmation[33] or delivery of the deed.[34]

A purchaser will be liable for damages due to the continuance by it of a nuisance created by the mortgagor company or receiver, of which such purchaser had notice.[35]

Earnings diverted to betterments. Where earnings of a railroad while in the hands of a receiver, which are applicable to contract and tort liabilities incurred by the receiver, are diverted to permanent improvements, the purchaser of the road may be liable to the extent of such improvements,[36] the rule being applicable to liability for torts of the receiver in possession occurring between the time of transfer of title and the final delivery of possession.[37]

Agency of receiver. The purchaser cannot be held liable on the ground that the receiver is his agent for the torts of the receiver, if continued in possession occurring between the time of the transfer of title and the final delivery of possession[38] except, perhaps, where the possession of the receiver is at the instance and for the benefit of the purchaser.[39]

Continuing duties The company purchasing a railroad under a foreclosure sale will be liable for any injury occurring after the purchase due to the nonperformance of any duty of a continuing nature, although it should have been performed by its predecessor.[40]

40. Mich.—Gage v. Pontiac, etc., R. Co., 63 N.W. 318, 105 Mich. 335.

It is a well-established principle of law that a railroad company which admits another railroad company to the joint common use of its tracks is liable for the negligent acts of such company in the enjoyment of such use,[41] although it was guilty of no negligence or breach of duty on its own part,[42] and such liability is not affected by the fact that the company using the tracks is also liable,[43] but where liability is predicated not on the negligence of the operating company, but on the negligence of the company owning the road, the circumstances must be such as to give rise to a duty toward the person injured.[44]

Unauthorized use of track. If a train of one company is trespassing on the tracks of another, the company owning the road is not liable for injuries due to the negligence of those in charge of the train.[45]

Use by several. The owner of a road which permits several other railroads to operate trains over it is liable for the whole of the damages arising from the construction of the road and operation of trains.[46]

b. Liability toward Employees of Licensee

Where one railroad company permits the joint or common use of its tracks by another, it is not liable for the negligence of the licensee company toward the employees of such licensee company, but it is liable for injuries to them caused by defects in its equipment or by the negligence of its own servants.

Where one railroad company permits the joint or common use of its tracks by another, it is not liable for the negligence of the licensee company toward the employees of such licensee company;[47] but it is liable for injuries to them caused by defects in the equipment[48] or by some negligence on the part of its own servants;[49] its duty toward the licensee's employees, however, is distinct from that which it owes the general public[50] or to passengers.[51]

The general rule is not affected by the fact that the capacity of the licensee's negligent servant has been investigated and pronounced acceptable to the former company.[52]

c. Liability for Injury Due to Defective Roadbed or Tracks

A railroad company permitting another to use its road is liable for injuries due to the defective condition of the roadbed, track, or bridges, or to the defective condition or negligent management of its switches.

"The law imposes upon the owner of a railroad the duty of operating it, and in consequence liability for injuries done by those who are allowed to operate it."—Seay v. Southern Ry. Co., 37 S.E.2d 535, 536, 208 S.C. 171—Jenkins v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 71 S.E. 1010, 1012, 89 S.C. 408.

The reason for the rule is that a railroad company owes the public certain duties, and that it cannot by its own act, without the consent of the legislature, absolve itself from its public obligations.—Willson v. Colorado & S. R. Co., 142 P. 174, 57 Colo. 303.

Owner of railroad which sold ties and rails thereof but continued to own right of way would be liable for injuries from negligent operation of engine by itself, by buyer, or by individual operating engine, with buyer's consent, as buyer's servant or as independent contractor.—H. to the defective condition or negligent management of its switches,[54] although the injured persons were employees of the latter company,[55] since it is the duty of a railroad to keep its tracks and roadbed in reasonably safe condition for use[56]

Connecting track. One company, by granting permission to another company to run trains over its road, does not become liable for injuries caused by the defective condition of a track constructed and controlled by the latter company for the purpose of connecting the two roads.[57]

d. Injuries to Animals

A railroad company owning a road which it permits another to use will be liable for injuries to animals caused by the negligent operation of the trains of the latter.

A railroad company owning a road which it permits another to use will be liable for injuries to animals caused by the negligent operation of the trains of the latter.[58] Where a statute makes a railroad company liable for injuries to animals resulting from failure to fence its right of way and erect cattle guards, a company owning a road will be liable for such injuries, although the injuries were inflicted by trains of a company using its road by its permission,[59] and the fact that the duty of fencing is imposed by the statute on companies using, as well as those owning, the road does not affect the liability of the company owning it.[60]

A railroad company permitting another to use its road is liable for fire caused by the negligence of the latter in operating locomotives or due to their defective condition, and such liability may be imposed by statute.

A railroad company permitting another to use its road is liable for fire caused by the negligence of that company in the operation of locomotives[61] or due to their defective or improper condition or equipment.[62] It will also be liable for its own negligence contributing to the injury in allowing combustible material to accumulate upon the right of way[63] or in furnishing to the company or person using the road defective or improperly equipped locomotives from which fire is communicated.[64]

Statutory liabilities. Under statutes imposing on railroads liability for fires communicated by locomotives operating over their roads, in some instances, regardless of the question of negligence, a company permitting another to use its road is held to be responsible for fires communicated by the engines of such other company,[65] and such a liability has been held not to be affected by another statute which gives authority to make running arrangements for the joint use of the road.[66]

f. Use under Statutory Permission

Where a statute gives the right to use the tracks of another railroad company for a purpose stated in the statute and without the consent of the owner, the owner company is under no liability for negligence of the user company in such use of the tracks.

Where a statute gives the right to use the tracks of another railroad company for a purpose stated in the statute and without the consent of the owner, the owner company is under no liability for negligence of the user company in such use of the tracks[67] Thus, where a statute specifically commands railroad companies to exchange cars at junction points, a railroad will not be liable for injuries caused by negligence of a connecting carrier

using its exchange track.[68] So, where, a statute gives one railroad the right to connect with another, the road with which the connection is made cannot be held liable for the construction of the connecting track, even though located on part of its right of way.[69]

§ 365. Railroad Using Road of Another

a. In general
b. Liability toward employees of licensor
c. Liability for injury due to defective roadbed or tracks
d. Injuries to animals
e. Fires

a. In General

A company using the road of another is liable for any negligence or misconduct of its own employees while under its control and in the conduct of its business or operation of trains over the road; but it is not liable if its servants or trains are under the control of the owner, or for injuries due to negligence of the servants of the owner.

A railroad company using the road of another is held to the same degree of care in its use as if it owned the road;[70] and it has been broadly held that both the licensor and the licensee are responsible for any damages arising out of the operation of the railroad.[71] The using company is bound, as far as the question of liability for negligence is concerned, by the same law as binds the owner,[72] whether at the time it is rightfully or wrongfully in the occupation and use of the road,[73] and such liability cannot be affected, as to third persons, by an agreement fixing liability as between the two roads.[74] It is liable for any negligence or misconduct on the part of its own employees while under its control and in the conduct of its business,[75] and in the operation of trains over the road of the other company,[76] without regard to whether such company owns the trains which its servants are operating,[77] notwithstanding there was also negligence on the part of the company owning the road,[78] and notwithstanding the trains are operated under, and subject to, the rules and orders of the company owning the road, if its servants are guilty of acts of negligence independent of, and not attributable to, the orders under which they are run.[79]

The using company will not be liable if its servants and trains, and all their movements, are at the time of the injury under the absolute and exclusive control of the company owning the road,[80] since it cannot be charged with negligence in failing to perform an act unless it has both the power and the right to perform it,[81] as where it could not do so without being guilty of an unwarrantable intrusion or trespass on the rights or property of the company owning the road.[82]

A railroad company using the road of another is not liable for injuries due solely to the negligence of the servants of the company owning the road in the operation of the trains of that company,[83] but will be liable for injuries incident to the operation of its own trains due to negligence on the part of servants in the employ of the company owning the road, such as gatemen or flagmen at crossings, whose services it adopts and relies on instead of employing others of its own for such duties.[84]

Use by several. Where the owner of a road permits its use by several other railroads, such railroads are each liable for their acts in the operation of trains thereover,[85] but, where their operation is not joint, they are not liable for the acts of the other users.[86]

b. Liability toward Employees of Licensor

A company using the tracks of another is liable for its negligence causing injury to an employee of the owner.

A company using the tracks of another company is liable for its negligence causing injury to an employee of such company,[87] although such liability cannot be predicated on the Federal Employers' Liability Act.[88] Such company may also be liable to one of its own employees for injuries arising from defects in the roadbed or tracks, as discussed in Master and Servant § 212 d.

c. Liability for Injury Due to Defective Roadbed or Tracks

A railroad company using the road of another is liable for injuries occurring in its use and due to a defective or dangerous condition.

A railroad company which uses a defective road belonging to another will be liable for injuries occurring in its own use of the road due to its defective or dangerous condition;[89] and it has been held that such liability extends not only to passengers and employees but also to third persons rightfully on or near the track who may be injured by reason of its unsafe condition.[90] However, it has also been held that a railroad operating trains over a roadbed belonging to another company, under contract, can presume that the owner, in constructing its railroad, had performed its statutory duty in properly constructing sluiceways.[91]

d. Injuries to Animals

A railroad company using the tracks of another company will be liable for injury to animals caused by its own negligence or that of its servants in the operation of trains over such road.

A railroad company using the tracks of another company will be liable for injury to animals caused by its own negligence or that of its servants in the operation of trains over such road.[92] Whether a company using the tracks of another company by its permission will be subject to the statutory liability under statutes requiring railroads, or those in the use or operation of them, to fence such roads and erect cattle guards, and imposing liability, irrespective of the question of negligence, for injury to animals caused by failure to comply therewith, will depend on the particular enactment under consideration,[93] and ordinarily it is held that in order to impose liability on the user company it must come within the terms of the statute;[94] but it has been held that, irrespective of the terms of the statute, the company using the road must, on grounds of public policy, be held subject to the statutory liability for assuming to use the road in an unfenced condition.[95]

Under a statute providing exemption from liability if tracks are fenced, but not requiring the erection of fences, it has been held that, if the tracks are inclosed in accordance with their pro-

Quasi employee; effect of statute
An employee of a company whose tracks were being rightfully used, at the time injuries were sustained by him, by another company, and who was at such time engaged in the service of his employer, is not a quasi employee of such latter company so as to preclude him from recovery against it for its negligence, under a statute providing that, when a person is injured while employed about the road of a railroad company, his right of action against it shall be only such as he would have were he its employee, and this is so, even though the track must be considered as the property of the latter company at such time.—Hunt v. visions, no company using the track is liable, in the absence of negligence, for an injury to stock[96]

e. Fires

A railroad company using the road of another is liable for damage by fire caused by its own negligence, but not that of the owner; and the user has been held to be within statutes imposing liability for fires.

A railroad company using the road of another is liable for damages caused by fires due to the negligent operation or defective condition of its locomotives,[97] notwithstanding the fire was communicated directly to combustible material which the company owning the road had permitted to accumulate on its right of way.[98] It will also be liable in the case of fire communicated by its engine and an engine of the company owning the road,[99] but not for fires caused by the negligence of the proprietary company alone[1]

A company using the road of another has been held within the application of a statute imposing liability, without regard to negligence, for fires communicated by locomotives,[2] and to be also liable under a statute imposing liability for fire caused by failure to keep the right of way clear of combustible material.[3]

§ 366. Connecting Roads

Where different companies operate connecting railroad lines, the liability of each is ordinarily limited to its own line, and each is liable only for the negligence of its own servants in the operation of its trains.

Where different companies operate connecting lines of railroad, the liability of each is ordinarily, in the absence of statute or agreement to the contrary, limited to its own line,[4] and each is liable for the negligence of its own servants in the operation of its trains and not for that of the other's servants,[5] although, as is the general rule in the case of master and servant, as discussed in Master and Servant § 566, a servant in the general employ of one railroad may be so hired or loaned to another as to become for a time the latter's servant, with all the legal consequences of the relation,[6] and so as to release the general master from liability.[7] Hence, where under an operating contract a train is turned over to a connecting road by another, and comes under the control and management of the receiving road, which pays a reasonable rental for the equipment and a proportionate share of the operating expenses including the pay of the crew, the delivering road is not liable for injuries to persons while the train is in the control of the receiving company.[8]

The fact that one company is a stockholder in a connecting line does not render it liable for the negligence of the servants of that company.[9]

§ 367. Terminal Company or Railroad Company

A terminal company allowing a railroad company to use its facilities is liable for its own negligence and may be liable for that of the railroad company; but the latter is not liable for acts of the terminal company beyond its control. Both companies may be liable for the negligence of an employee acting for both.

Where a railroad properly and of necessity has entered into a contract with a terminal or union station company, by which its trains, while in the station, are controlled by the terminal company,

Avoidance of liability as "switching agent"
Railroad company, delivering a loaded freight car of another railroad to consignee, could not escape liability for injury to employee of consignee while unloading car on basis that it was merely a "switching agent," or "switching carrier," and not a "delivery carrier."—Spears v. it is not liable for the acts of the terminal company which it cannot control,[10] but, where the servants of the railroad company remain in charge of its trains notwithstanding they are under the direction of the terminal company, both the terminal company and the railroad company may be liable for an injury resulting from a negligent act of the employees of the railroad concurring with a negligent act of the terminal company.[11] The terminal company is liable for negligent acts in which it participates,[12] and, where other railroads use its tracks, it may under the rules applicable in the case of a railroad permitting the use of its tracks by others generally, as discussed supra § 364, be liable for their negligence, although not guilty of negligence itself[13]

Where an employee of a terminal company acts in the performance of a particular duty as agent both of the terminal company and of the railroad companies using its facilities, both may be liable for his negligence.[14]

Injuries to employees. The fact that a railroad company is a stockholder in a terminal company, the facilities of which it uses, does not impose liability on it in tort for injury to the employees of the terminal company.[15] It has been held that, while railroad companies may, in contracts to facilitate the movements of trains at terminals, incur liabilities for injuries to the employees of other companies resulting from the negligence of their own employees, such contracts will not by construction be extended to the movements of trains beyond the scope of their terms.[16] The fact that an employee of a union depot company directs, as part of his duties, trains of a railroad company using the station has been held not to make him an employee of the latter company so as to render it liable for injuries to him[17]

Where a terminal association places a car on a receiving track for inspection to determine whether the car is to be accepted by the railroad, the association, and not the railroad, is liable for injuries sustained by the latter's employee, because of a defect in the car, while making the inspection.[18]

§ 368. Companies Owning or Using Cars

a. In general
b. Liability toward employees

a. In General

A railroad company using a car received from another company is subject to the same liability in its use as if it were itself the owner.

A railroad company using for its own purpose a car received from another company must be regarded as having adopted it as part of its own equipment,[19] and it is subject to the same liability in its use as if it were itself the owner of the car,[20] in such case, where the car is used without authority and against the rights of the owner, the owner will not be liable, although the cause of the accident was a secret defect in the car, which might be found to have been known to him.[21] A company which leases a car to another will not be liable for injury to one in loading such car where it is

Care required
Where deceased was crossing a strip of land owned by a terminal company and used by railroad under a so-called side-track agreement when struck by train and there was no express or implied invitation to deceased by terminal company or the railroad to cross the strip, railroad's duty of care to the deceased was no greater than the duty owed by the terminal company.—Belliveau v. not shown that the defect causing the injury existed at the time of the lease.[22]

b. Liability toward Employees

A railroad company which transfers a car of its own to a connecting carrier for use on its line is, according to some but not other authorities, liable for an injury to the servants of the connecting carrier for an injury caused by a defective car negligently transferred by it.

A railroad company which transfers a car of its own to a connecting carrier for use on its line is, according to some authorities, liable for an injury to the servants of the connecting carrier for an injury caused by a defective car negligently transferred by it,[23] notwithstanding the company employing them was also negligent with respect to inspecting and receiving the car;[24] and a railroad which is a member of a railway association permitting members to use the cars of each other has been held liable for a defect in its car causing injury to an employee of another road using such car.[25] According to other authorities, however, the liability of the delivering company ceases as soon as the receiving company has inspected and assumed control of the car,[26] except as to latent or secret defects.[27]

The duty of the railroad toward its own employees with respect to the inspection and discovery of defects in the cars of other companies used by it is considered in Master and Servant §§ 212 b and 236 b.

Use of car for own purpose. In any event, if the receiving company, after the car should have been returned, fails to do so and uses it in its own business, the company owning it will not be liable for injuries to the servants of the other company due to the defects in the car;[28] nor will it be liable where the car, at the time of the injury, was being used solely in the business of the other company.[29]

§ 369. Industrial or Logging Roads

A corporation controlling and operating a railroad merely as an instrumentality of its business, or operating a private railroad for logging purposes, is liable for the negligence or misconduct of its servants.

Corporations other than railroad companies, which control and operate railroads merely as adjuncts or instrumentalities of their business,[30] or operate a private railroad for logging purposes,[31] are liable to the same extent as an ordinary public railroad company for the negligence or misconduct of their servants; but notwithstanding there is a close relationship between the corporations, such liability does not attach where the railroad is operated and managed by a distinct corporation which serves members of the public generally as a common carrier.[32] An "industrial track agreement" between a railroad company and a shipper for the construction and maintenance of a spur track may be such as to make the track a part of the railroad, with respect to liability for injury.[33]

Liability for fires. A company controlling and operating an industrial or logging road will be liable for fires negligently caused by igniting combustible material allowed to accumulate on the right of way.[34]

a. Personal Liability in General

An agent or employee of a railroad company may be liable, in some jurisdictions, only for misfeasance; in other jurisdictions he is liable for misfeasance or nonfeasance.

In those jurisdictions in which a distinction is drawn between acts of misfeasance and nonfeasance in determining the personal liability of a servant for his acts, as discussed in Master and Servant § 577, the agent or employee of a railroad company is held to personal liability only for his acts of misfeasance;[35] but in other jurisdictions such liability is imposed whether the negligent or wrongful act by which the injury is occasioned is one of misfeasance or of nonfeasance,[36] and the agent or employee cannot escape liability on the ground that he was acting merely as agent for another.[37]

Where the duty of the servant arises only because of the duty imposed on the railroad company, his employer, he can be held liable only where a duty is owing by the railroad to the person injured;[38] and, where a statute restricts liability for failure to give warning signals to the railroad company alone, its employees cannot be held personally liable thereunder.[39]

In order to charge a railroad employee with personal liability, it is insufficient to allege that he "negligently and carelessly maintained" tracks,[40] without a statement of facts showing in what his negligence consisted whereby he committed a breach of, or omitted, a duty to the injured person.[41]

A street-crossing watchman, whose duty is to warn traffic of the approach of trains, has been held not liable for the death of a person struck by a train at a crossing, because of his failure to make an effort to stop the train, in the absence of evidence that he had any control over trains crossing the street;[42] the operator of a railroad signal tower is under no duty to a motorist stalled on a nearby crossing to stop a train which is about to strike the motorist,[43] and, in particular circumstances there has been held to be no cause or right of action against an engineer in the absence of any showing that he had any supervision over the loading or inspection of the train or any control of any part of it other than the engine, or that he was in any way responsible for the alleged negligent act.[44]

Statutory liability for injury to animals. Under statutes making railroads and their agents liable for injury to animals where the road is not fenced, the term "agent" has been held to apply to engineers[45] and firemen[46] engaged in the operation of the trains by which such injuries are inflicted.

Use of defective equipment. Where a railroad company furnishes defective equipment to an employee and directs him to operate it, the servant is not personally liable for injuries occasioned by reason of such defect.[47]

b. Negligence of Coemployee

A railroad employee is not liable for a fellow employee's negligence unless he has some direct control over, or participation in, the wrong complained of.

An employee of a railroad company is not liable for the negligence of a fellow employee unless he has some direct control over, or participation in, the wrong complained of;[48] and it has been held that employees whose negligence contributed to the accident, but whose acts were entirely independent of each other, are not jointly liable for

§ 371. Private Individuals

a Shippers, consignees, or others than railroads moving, loading, or unloading cars
b. Owner of land on which spur track located; owner of private switch track
c. Other persons

a. Shippers, Consignees, or Others than Railroads Moving, Loading, or Unloading Cars

A private individual, such as a shipper or consignee, is liable for his negligent or wrongful acts in moving, handling, or loading railroad cars.

A shipper, consignee, or other private individual will be liable for injuries occasioned by his negligent or wrongful acts, or those of his servants or agents within the scope of their employment, in moving or handling the cars of a railroad.[51] Where a railway company permits third persons to place loaded cars on a spur track, negligence of the servants of such third persons in placing cars so near the main line as to cause a collision is the negligence of the company.[52] As between the ultimate carrier and the consignee, the carrier will be liable for injuries to third persons caused by the car or its contents while in the possession of the railroad awaiting delivery to the consignee.[53]

Negligence in loading cars. A railroad company ordinarily will not be liable for injuries caused by the negligence of a shipper while loading a car furnished him for that purpose;[54] but the shipper will be liable.[55]

b. Owner of Land on Which Spur Track Located; Owner of Private Switch Track

The owner of land on which a spur track is constructed, and the owner of a private switch track, may be liable for injuries occasioned by the use of such facilities by railroads for such owners' benefit or purposes.

The owner of land allowing a spur track to be constructed thereon, which is used by a railroad and himself for their common interest, is liable for injuries occasioned where the railroad is using the spur track for their mutual benefit[56] or for his own benefit,[57] but he is not liable where the injury is occasioned while the railroad is using the track for other purposes.[58]

The owner of a private switch track, and not the railroad, it has been held, is liable for an injury occasioned by a movement of cars thereon by the railroad for his purposes,[59] and, further, it has been held that the railroad is not liable for the negligent operation of its cars upon a private switch by the employees of the switch owner.[60]

c. Other Persons

One who maliciously interferes with railroad cars or machinery is liable for resulting injury, as is one who negligently, although with the consent of the railroad, constructs and maintains an obstruction over or near a track.

One who maliciously interferes with railroad cars or machinery is liable for injury caused by his wrongful act.[61]

One who constructs and maintains an obstruction over or near a railroad track may be liable to a person injured by his negligence in so doing, although the railroad has consented thereto.[62]

§ 372. Joint Liability

a. In general
b. Concurrent negligence
c. For acts of joint employees
d. Of railroad and employees

a. In General

Where a railroad company is liable for the acts of another company or person in the operation or management of the road, the liability ordinarily is joint.

The liability of a lessor for the negligence of the lessee ordinarily is joint,[64] as is the liability of a road for the acts of another road which it permits to use it,[65] or of another road which it owns and operates,[66] or in cases of joint operation.[67] However, in the case of a liability of a consolidated company for the acts of a constituent company, because of the consolidation, it has been held that, while the consolidated corporation as well as the constituent company is liable, the liability is not joint.[68]

The existence of a joint liability is not affected by the fact that one company may be entitled to recover over from the other,[69] or by a contract between the companies, or persons liable, fixing as between themselves on one of them only a liability imposed by law[70] or a duty owed to third persons.[71]

A company jointly liable for the acts of others cannot object that it is sued jointly;[72] plaintiff is not obliged to sue all, but may elect to sue either.[73]

b. Concurrent Negligence

Two railroad companies, or a railroad company and another person, whose concurrent negligence contributes to an injury are jointly liable and may be sued jointly, and have also been held to be suable severally.

Where the concurrent negligence of two railroad companies, or of a railroad company and another person, contributes to an injury, they are jointly liable, and may be sued jointly;[74] and

Companies which delivered ties on railroad right of way under agreement for sale thereof to railroad were invitees and not trespassers, with same rights thereon as railroad, so that their liability for death of child killed by falling tie was governed by same considerations applicable to railroad.—Anderson v. this is the rule although the negligence was not by preconcert[75] and the parties acted independently of each other,[76] and although there was no neglect of the same common duty;[77] nor is it material that one of defendants owed to plaintiff a higher degree of care than the other.[78]

It has also been held that the parties may be sued severally.[79]

c. For Acts of Joint Employees

Railroad companies are jointly and severally liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of a servant or servants employed by them jointly

Where an injury is caused by a train which at the time is under the joint control of servants of two or more railroad companies,[80] or of servants employed by them jointly,[81] they are jointly and severally liable, and this is the rule where the train is being operated by one company over the tracks of another[82] as well as where the train is jointly operated by the companies.[83] Where an employee performs services for two or more companies, whether at the time of an injury caused by his negligence he was acting jointly for them so as to create a joint liability or for one of them alone will depend on the facts and the inferences to be drawn from them.[84]

Flagman; crossing watchman. Separate railroad companies jointly employing a flagman at a highway crossing which constitutes a point of common interest have been held jointly liable for his negligence,[85] and two companies jointly owning a railroad which crosses a public highway and jointly employing a watchman to guard the crossing have been held jointly and severally liable in an action based on his negligence,[86] notwithstanding any agreement fixing their rights and liabilities as between themselves.[87] Likewise, in case of a flagman at a double crossing, where he is employed by one company and the other companies using the crossing pay a proportionate part of his wages, the company employing him has been held liable for an injury caused by his negligence in performing his duties in connection with the passing of a train of one of the other companies over the crossing on such other company's track,[88] and the company using the crossing at the time and whose engine or train does the damage is likewise liable.[89]

On the other hand, where flagmen of parallel roads watch each other's movements, as well as everything else that is happening in their vicinity, the companies are not jointly liable for an accident at a crossing on one of them where no other connection is shown between them.[90]

d. Of Railroad and Employees

A railroad company and its employees are jointly liable for their concurrent negligence, as well as, under most authorities, for the torts of such employees committed within the scope of their employment.

most jurisdictions it is also held that a railroad company and its employees are jointly liable for the torts of the latter committed within the scope of their employment,[92] and may be sued jointly,[93] although some authorities hold that the liability of the railroad company for the torts of its servants, where there is no concurrent negligence on the part of the railroad, is not joint but several,[94] and that in order to render the company jointly liable there must have been actual participation or negligence on the part of the company concurring with that of the employee, as contradistinguished from imputed negligence of the master concurring with an act negligently committed by the servant.[95]

Joint liability for willful tort. The railroad company has been held jointly liable even for the willful tort of its employee committed in the scope of his employment;[96] but there is also authority to the contrary.[97]

§ 373. Pleading Ownership and Operation

a. Complaint, declaration, or petition

b Plea or answer

c. Issues, proof, and variance

a. Complaint, Declaration, or Petition

In an action for injuries arising out of the operation of a railroad, general rules of pleading govern the complaint, declaration, or petition with respect to the pleading of ownership and operation.

In an action for injuries arising out of the operation of a railroad, it should be alleged directly and positively that defendant or someone for whose acts it is liable caused the injury complained of.[98] A complaint or petition which seeks to charge one railroad company with liability for the tort of another must set forth the manner in which, or the reason for which, the liability attaches.[99]

Where, as discussed supra §§ 351-360, the lessor is liable for the act of its lessee in the operation of the road, according to some authorities the act may be charged in the petition as the act of the lessor;[1] according to other authorities, however, where it is sought to hold the owner of the road liable for its lessee's acts, the relation between the roads must be pleaded with the appropriate facts necessary to create the liability,[2] and the complaint must show by which company the injury was inflicted.[3] Where it is sought to hold a railroad for an act committed while running its trains over the road of another railroad, the facts material to a recovery must be pleaded.[4]

Excessive speed; direction of employer
If tram of defendant employer was, without its express direction, operated by defendant motorneer at an excessive speed, employer would be liable only under rule of respondeat superior, defendants being in no sense joint tort-feasors; but if negligent speed was maintained by defendant employer's express direction, it would be negligent, and its negligence would concur with that of defendant motorneer who obeyed the instruction, and the right to recover against defendants would be joint.—Benson v. Co. v. Flynt, 82 So. 25, 203 Ala. 65.

Agency in operation Complaint against railroad company and its receiver for injuries received in collision at crossing need not allege agency in operation of railroad.—Pollard v. Rogers, 173 So. 881, 234 Ala. 92.

Existence of receivership
(1) Original and supplemental petition, which stated complete cause of action against receivers of railroad, were sufficient without alleging that receivership existed when cause of action arose, where, on date alleged, railroad was in hands of receivers.—King v Illinois Cent. R Co., 131 So. 68, 15 La.App. 1.

4. Ind.—Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Bunnell, 61 Ind 183.

Name in which road operated. In an action against a lessee or any company or person operating the road of another, it is not, in the absence of statutory requirement, necessary to allege in what name the road was operated,[5] but under a statute making a lessee liable for stock killed by reason of the lessor's failure to fence its road, where the lessee operates the road in the corporate name of the lessor, such a fact is material to the right to recover and must be alleged.[6]

Jurisdictional averments. A declaration which names defendant as lessee of a specified railroad and which indicates that defendant is in possession of and operating the road, although no lease is set out or expressly alleged, may be construed as seeking to charge defendant in its character as lessee for the purpose of bringing the action within the provisions of a statute permitting the lessee to be sued in a court or jurisdiction wherein the lessor may be sued.[7]

Assumption of liability by consolidated company. In an action against a consolidated company for a tort of one of the constituent companies, committed prior to the consolidation, it is not necessary to allege an express assumption of such liability by defendant in the articles of consolidation[8] or to set out such articles in the complaint.[9]

Joint liability. In an action against two railroad companies jointly, it is sufficient to charge that the act complained of was done by both defendants, without showing what relation they sustained to each other,[10] and if the existence of a particular relation between them is essential to fix a liability on either this is a matter of proof;[11] but where, by reason of the relation between the companies, a joint liability is created by statute on the arising of an injury out of the operation of the train of one company upon the road of another, the complaint must allege such a relation as to bring the case within the terms of the act.[12] In an action against two railroads for damages for personal injuries, a declaration stating that they jointly maintained a depot, waiting room, etc., has been held to state a joint cause of action against them.[13]

In a joint action against a railroad company and an employee, under a statute creating a presumption of negligence against a railroad company where injury is inflicted by the engines or cars of such company, it is sufficient, as against the company, to charge that the person was injured by the running of the train;[14] but as to such employee, where the statute is not broad enough to include him, it is necessary to allege facts showing in what his negligence consisted.[15]

b. Plea or Answer

In an action for injuries arising out of the operation of a railroad, general rules of pleading govern the plea or answer with respect to defenses involving ownership and operation.

In an action for injuries arising out of the operation of a railroad, where defendant railroad company relies on the defense that it had made an authorized sale and that the road was being operated by its vendee, the answer must show that the circumstances authorizing such sale existed;[16] and a defendant company claiming to have leased its line to another company before the occurrence of the injury complained of has the duty of pleading and proving such lease and approval thereof by the interstate commerce commission, as provided by law.[17] A plea showing that the injury complained of was the act of another and different railroad company presents a sufficient defense and is not demurrable.[18]

Defense that road was being operated by receiver at the time of the negligence complained of and not by a defendant railroad company need not be raised by special plea or answer,[19] since such defense is available under a general denial;[20] nor need the answer set forth a copy of the order of the court appointing the receiver.[21]

c. Issues, Proof, and Variance

In actions for injuries arising out of the operation of railroads, general rules govern with respect to issues, proof, and variance as affecting the pleading of ownership and operation.

Plaintiff must introduce proof in support of every material allegation of the complaint essential to a recovery[22] unless admitted by the pleadings,[23] or conceded on the trial,[24] or waived.[25]

Under a plea of the general issue or general denial, defendant railroad company may show that the injury complained of occurred upon the road of a different company and through the negligence of the latter's servants,[26] or, if upon its own road, that at the time of the injury the road was in the hands of, and being operated by, a receiver[27] or a lessee of defendant where it would not be liable for the act of such lessee,[28] or that defendant was operating the road as lessee of another company, where such fact would be a defense as to the liability in issue.[29]

The proof must conform to the allegations of the pleadings showing liability, and any material variance is fatal to a recovery,[30] but a variance which could not have surprised or prejudiced the adverse party will not be regarded as material.[31]

A particular petition in an action against the lessor of a railroad has been held sufficiently broad to permit the introduction of evidence that defendant accepted the operation of its road by the lessee's receivers.[32]

§ 374. Evidence as to Ownership and Operation

The general rules of evidence in civil actions have been applied in actions for injuries arising out of the operation of railroads.

In accordance with the general rules of evidence in civil actions, while, in the absence of any presumption arising from statutory provisions,[33] the burden is on plaintiff to show such facts with respect to the ownership, operation, or use of the railroad as are necessary to establish a liability on the part of defendant for the injury complained of,[34] it will be presumed, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, where it is shown or admitted that defendant owned the road, that it also controlled and operated it,[35] or, if in possession of and operating the road, that it is the owner of the road,[36] that trains operated upon defendant's road were owned and operated by it,[37] that a locomotive operated by defendant

Variance held not fatal
In an action against a county and a railroad for injuries from a defective sidewalk both on the right of way and the highway, the submission of the case to the jury on the theory that the railroad merely had a statutory right to cross the highway was not a fatal variance, where the complaint alleged that the railroad "owned, controlled, and maintained" the right of way.—Bullock v. Connection with fusee found on right of way
In action against railroad for injuries from burns caused by fusee found on its right of way, it was essential to show railroad's connection with the particular fusee, but possession might justify an inference of ownership.—Dabrowski v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 24 N.E.2d 382, 303 Ill.App. 31.

upon its road was its locomotive,[38] or, if attached to one of defendant's regular trains, that it was under its control,[39] and that a locomotive bearing the name or initials of defendant company was owned and operated by it;[40] but it has also been held that proof that an engine had on it the name of defendant railroad, unsupported by any other fact, is insufficient to authorize the inference that, at the time of the injury, it was owned by defendant[41] and was being operated by its employees in its business.[42]

Where two or more companies operate over the same track, there is no presumption as to which inflicted the injury, and the burden is on plaintiff to show this fact;[43] but where a locomotive is operated by an unincorporated association of railroad companies, constituting a switching association, it will be presumed that the company owning the locomotive is a member of the association.[44] Where two railroads, not partners, use only a part of their respective premises jointly, a person suing them jointly must show that his injury occurred at a place covered by the joint use.[45]

Where a defendant railroad sets out in its plea or answer that the injury sued on was caused by the negligence of another company, the burden is on it to establish facts necessary to sustain such defense.[46]

Admissibility. In actions for injuries arising out of the operation of railroads, generally speaking, any evidence is admissible which is relevant to any material question in issue as to the ownership, operation, or use of the railroad.[47]

Weight and sufficiency. In an action for injuries arising out of the operation of a railroad, plaintiff must show by a preponderance of evidence such facts with respect to defendant's ownership or operation of the road or agency causing the injury as are necessary to create a liability therefor,[48] but direct and positive evidence of such facts is not always essential,[49] and, since positive proof of the actual facts of ownership and oper-

Rules of interstate commerce commission

In action against shipper of barrels by consignee's employee who was injured by barrel which fell from boxcar door, evidence of interstate commerce commission rules governing loading and movement of freight shipment at carload freight rates was properly admitted—Wintersteen v National Cooperage & Woodenware Co., 197 N.E. 578, 361 Ill. 95.

Proof of operation by lessee

In absence of legislative authority, or offer of proof thereof, exempting a lessor railroad from responsibility to the public for lessee's torts, trial court did not err in sustaining objections to certified copies of lease between railroad as lessor and another railroad as lessee and of approval of interstate commerce commission of lease, or to other offer of proof that train was being operated by lessee—Los Angeles & S. Duty of railroad as delivering carrier

In action by forwarding base employee against railroad for injuries sustained when struck by freight car, while reloading car which had been unloaded on tracks of base, evidence sustained finding that defendant railroad was delivering carrier and had duty to furnish car in which it was safe for base employees to work.—Powell v. Pacific Naval Air Base Contractors, 209 P.2d 631, 93 Cal.App 2d 629

Operation by receivers

(1) Vouchers for wages and orders issued in the name of alleged receivers of railroad sufficiently showed that it was being operated by receivers.—McCall v. Pitcairn, 6 N.W. 2d 415, 232 Iowa 867.

(2) In action against receivers of railroad and engineer, testimony of engineer that he was the engineer "of the defendants" and operated train when deceased was killed was sufficient to show that receivers were operating train through their engineer and fireman—March v. Lessor's acceptance of operation by lessee's receivers

ation ordinarily is easy for defendant and often difficult or impossible for plaintiff,[50] it is sufficient for plaintiff in the first instance to make a prima facie case by evidence of facts from which defendant's ownership or operation may be presumed,[51] and this, if defendant introduces no evidence to the contrary, will be sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff;[52] but evidence on the part of plaintiff which is inconclusive is not sufficient,[53] nor is evidence sufficient which merely creates a presumption as against direct and positive evidence on the part of defendant to the contrary.[54]

In actions for injuries arising out of the operation of railroads, questions of fact should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court.

As in other civil actions, in actions for injuries arising out of the operation of railroads, questions of fact involving ownership and operation are for the jury,[55] and the case should be submitted to the jury wherever there is any competent evidence with respect to the ownership, operation, or control of the road or agency causing the injury which tends to show a liability on the part of defendant therefor,[56] or where the evidence with respect to such ownership or operation is conflicting or different conclusions might reasonably be drawn therefrom.[57]

The court may, where proper, direct a verdict,[58] and where the facts show that plaintiff has no cause of action it is error not to direct a verdict for defendant where requested.[59] The court may direct a verdict as to one joint defendant.[60] Where there is a material question of fact to be determined, the court should refuse a request for a directed verdict,[61] and where there is no evidence connecting a defendant railroad with the accident a nonsuit is proper.[62]

Instructions. The rules governing the giving of instructions in trials generally are applicable, as, for example, that they should be based on the law and the facts,[63] that they should not be misleading[64] or prejudicial,[65] and that, where essentially covered by other instructions, it is not error to refuse to give requested instructions,[66] or to refuse to give them in the exact language of the request.[67]

Verdict. The jury in its verdict may find for one joint defendant and against the other,[68] and the latter cannot complain that a verdict was rendered against it alone,[69] since a verdict in favor of one joint defendant is not a verdict in favor of the other;[70] but the verdict may not apportion an award of damages as between defendants.[71]

Where a joint action is brought against a railroad company and a contractor for injuries due to the condition of a crossing, which the contractor had agreed with the railroad company to keep in repair, the jury may, if they find the injury was due to the negligence of the contractor, render a verdict in favor of plaintiff against both defendants, and in favor of the railroad company over against the contractor, where a demand for such judgment is made in the pleadings of defendant railroad company.[72]

XI. RECEIVERS

A court may place a railroad in the hands of a receiver, but it will not do so unless a necessity therefor is shown and there is no other adequate remedy.

In a proper case a court may place a railroad in the hands of a receiver;[73] but, as discussed infra § 377 a, the power is always exercised with reluctance and only in case of manifest necessity in order to preserve the property and protect the rights of those interested therein, and a receiver will not be appointed where such necessity is not shown[74] or there is another adequate remedy at law or in equity.[75] It has been held that in order to justify the appointment there must be a suit pending,[76] the appointment of a receiver being merely ancillary to the relief demanded in the suit.[77] In the absence of a statute expressly providing for the appointment of receivers for railroads, general statutes covering the appointment of receivers are applicable to railroads in a proper case,[78] but, as discussed infra § 378 a, the power of the court to make such appointment is not dependent on statutory enactment unless the appointment is expressly forbidden in cases not falling within the statute.[79]

Collusion and fraud. A receiver will not be appointed where it appears that the suit is collusive and designed to accomplish some fraudulent or improper purpose;[80] but it is not sufficient evidence of a fraudulent collusion that the officers or directors of the company concurred in the application for the appointment[81] or admitted the truth of the allegations of the bill.[82]

§ 377. Grounds of Appointment

a. In general
b. Default in payment of indebtedness
c. Mismanagement of road

a. In General

The appointment of a receiver for a railroad is dependent on the circumstances of the particular case; it rests in the sound discretion of the court and is to be made sparingly and cautiously, but a receiver will be appointed where such relief is necessary to preserve and protect the property and rights of interested parties.

The propriety of appointing a receiver for a railroad is so dependent on the circumstances of each particular case that it is impracticable to attempt definitely to state the grounds which will justify such appointment.[83] The matter ordinarily is said to rest in the discretion of the court,[84] which, however, is not arbitrary but is to be exercised in accordance with the settled principles governing the appointment of receivers,[85] and always sparingly, cautiously, and with reference to all the circumstances of the particular case.[86] A receiver will not be appointed merely because it would do no harm,[87] or because all the parties consent,[88] or merely because the company is insolvent,[89] or where the appointment is for the sole purpose of operating the railroad, without any limitation as to time, and the receivership is not ancillary to other equitable or legal relief sought,[90] or where it appears that a greater injury would result from the appointment of a receiver than from leaving the road in the hands of the present management,[91] or where it does not appear that the circumstances are such as to make the appointment of a receiver necessary.[92]

On the other hand, a receiver will be appointed where it appears that such relief is necessary to preserve and protect the property and the rights of those interested therein;[93] and a court may, when necessary, intervene by the appointment of a receiver to protect the interests of creditors or stockholders.[94] So, in order to protect the security of the bondholders, a receiver will be appointed with authority to complete the construction of a railroad, where the company is unable to do so, in order to prevent a forfeiture of its charter[95] or of a valuable land grant.[96] A receiver may also be appointed in proceedings by the state to compel the corporation to perform its duty to the public as directed by a mandate of the court[97] or to forfeit its charter.[98] A receiver may be appointed to insure, as far as practicable, the discharge of the public function of the corporation.[99]

b. Default in Payment of Indebtedness

Default in the payment of indebtedness owed by the railroad is not of itself sufficient to necessitate the appointment of a receiver, but such an appointment will be made when additional circumstances show the necessity therefor.

A default in the payment of principal or interest of bonds or mortgages is not of itself sufficient to necessitate the appointment of a receiver,[1] although the claim on the bond has been reduced to a judgment[2] or the company is insolvent;[3] but the matter rests in the discretion of the court,[4] and a receiver will not be appointed in such case where it does not appear to be necessary,[5] as where there is a complete and adequate remedy at law[6] or where it appears that it would do more harm than good.[7]

Such appointment will, however, be made whenever a necessity therefor is shown,[8] as where, in addition to the default, the company is insolvent and the mortgage security inadequate,[9] particularly if there be other considerations making such appointment proper, as where the officers of the company are acting contrary to the interest of the stockholders,[10] are guilty of gross misconduct,[11] such as appropriation of income to preferential payment of claims,[12] or misapplying[13] or diverting[14] the earnings of the road, or failing to apply the earnings to the payment of interest,[15] or the road is in possession of certain bondholders whose interests are hostile to the other bondholders.[16] Also, it is proper to appoint a receiver where, although the railroad is not insolvent, it is unable to pay its creditors with funds on hand or obtainable, and many of the creditors are threatening to file suits, and the appointment of a receiver is necessary to prevent a threatened multiplicity of suits pending action by the interstate commerce commission on an application to abandon the railroad.[17]

The court may also appoint a receiver where by the terms of a deed of trust it is made the duty of the trustee to take possession on default and he fails to do so,[18] or where the mortgage or deed of trust authorizes the mortgagee or trustee on a default to take possession and operate the road and apply the income to the payment of the indebtedness.[19] So also, where the trustees under a prior mortgage take possession and undertake to execute the trust prejudicially to the subsequent encumbrancers, the court will take the road out of their possession and place it in the hands of a receiver.[20] Circumstances may also exist where a default is imminent which will make the appointment of a receiver proper before the default has actually occurred,[21] but ordinarily a receiver will not be appointed before default.[22]

In a mortgage foreclosure suit a receiver may be appointed temporarily to conserve the property of the road until it can be determined whether anyone will undertake to operate it.[23] Where in a foreclosure suit the bondholders are entitled to take possession by a receiver and manage the property, the fact that it is being properly managed by the company is not ground for refusing to appoint a receiver.[24]

c. Mismanagement and Road

A receiver will not be appointed for a railroad merely because of mismanagement.

A receiver will not be appointed merely because of mismanagement of the road[25] or because of internal dissensions regarding the management of the road;[26] but, where a railroad has been mortgaged and the company is notoriously insolvent and is wasting the property so as to imperil the security, a receiver will be appointed.[27] In the absence of statute the court will not appoint a receiver ex parte to operate a railroad unless immediate necessity for such relief is clearly shown.[28]

a. In General

Courts of equity and courts of general jurisdiction having the powers previously exercised by courts of equity have jurisdiction to appoint receivers for railroads which have some real estate or other property of a fixed nature belonging to the railroad within the territorial jurisdiction of the court.

Courts of equity have inherent jurisdiction, independently of statute, to appoint receivers for railroads,[29] although in some cases statutory provisions regulate the appointment of receivers.[30] In jurisdictions where law and equity are administered by the same court, the power is exercised by courts of general jurisdiction having the powers previously exercised by courts of equity.[31] In order for a court to have jurisdiction to appoint a receiver for a railroad there must be some real estate or other property of a fixed nature belonging to the railroad within the territorial jurisdiction of the court.[32] However, although a court cannot extend its powers beyond its territorial jurisdiction,[33] it has been held that a court having jurisdiction of the person of the corporation may appoint a receiver for an entire line of railroad, although extending beyond the jurisdiction of the court or running through several different states,[34] and may acquire possession of the property by compelling the company to execute assignments to the receiver.[35] The fact that some of the property may be in the hands of third persons so that the receiver may have to invoke the assistance of the courts in other jurisdictions is no ground for refusing to make such appointment, since such assistance will ordinarily be granted through comity;[36] but the usual practice, as appears infra § 389 b, is to institute ancillary proceedings in the different jurisdictions for the appointment of the same person as receiver of the entire property.

In foreclosure proceedings the court properly can appoint a receiver only for that portion of the road or property of the railroad company covered by the mortgage;[37] and in case of several distinct roads operated as a general system, the court cannot, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage on one of such roads, appoint a receiver for the roads of the other companies which are not affected by the mortgage and are not parties to the suit.[38]

In a suit to enforce a contract lien on a mortgaged road the court has jurisdiction, in advance of any application to foreclose the mortgage, to take possession of the property by a receiver and sell it subject to all superior liens, and distribute the proceeds among those entitled thereto.[39]

Appointment of special receiver after discharge of receiver. Where the court in discharging receivers reserves jurisdiction for the purpose of enforcing a requirement of its decree, it has the power under such reserved jurisdiction to appoint a special receiver for such purpose.[40]

b. Who May Make Application for Appointment

Receivers for railroads may be appointed, in a proper case, on the application of stockholders, mortgagees, or other secured creditors or their representatives, and, under some circumstances, on the application of the railroad itself or of the state; ordinarily a receiver will not be appointed at the instance of a simple contract creditor without a lien.

Receivers for railroads may be appointed, in a proper case, on the application of mortgagees[41] or trustees in a deed of trust,[42] bondholders,[43] stockholders,[44] or creditors,[45] and under statutes providing therefor a receiver may be appointed on the application of a judgment creditor.[46] However, is has been held that ordinarily a receiver should not be appointed for a railroad at the instance of a simple contract creditor without a lien unless he has some peculiar equity or beneficial interest in the property,[47] and users of the railroad asserting unliquidated claims for damages and penalties arising out of the failure of the railroad to accept and transport merchandise have no right to apply in their own names as individual members of the public for the appointment of a receiver.[48]

On application of the company. While it is unusual,[49] and the power to make it has been expressly denied by some courts,[50] it has been held that the appointment of a receiver may under some circumstances be made on the application of the company itself.[51]

On application by state. Under statutes so providing the state district attorney may institute ex rel quo warranto proceedings in the name of the state against a railroad and its owners to procure a receivership.[52]

Also, it has been held that in forfeiture proceedings, the state, although not a creditor of the company, may, in the interest of the public, apply for the appointment of a receiver.[53]

c. Proceedings for Appointment

(1) In general
(2) Hearing, determination, and order

(1) In General

In the absence of a specific statute, the general rules governing the appointment of receivers apply to proceedings for the appointment of a receiver of a railroad.

General rules govern the proceedings for the appointment of a receiver of a railroad company except to the extent that the matter may be otherwise controlled by particular statutory provisions.[54] In cases arising under the codes, where it is not provided otherwise, the usages of courts of equity as to the manner of appointing receivers are applicable.[55]

Notice of application. Ordinarily a receiver for a railroad should not be appointed on an ex parte application,[56] and the court will not appoint a receiver without notice to the adverse party and an opportunity to be heard where it is not shown that a manifest and urgent necessity for such immediate appointment exists[57] or where a temporary injunction will adequately protect the rights of the parties until such notice can be given.[58] Circumstances may arise, however, under which the appointment of a receiver on an ex parte application without notice will be proper.[59] Where not required by statute, in a proceeding to dissolve a railroad corporation, it is not necessary that a valid order to show cause why the corporation should not be dissolved should precede the appointment of a temporary receiver where there is an order to show cause why such receiver should not be appointed.[60]

Sufficiency of application. The bill or petition for a receiver must in all cases allege facts sufficient to justify the appointment,[61] and allegations which simply amount to charges of insolvency and default are not sufficient.[62] The bill should contain a statement of facts such as would show that plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law.[63] However, the fact that the averments were not such as to have made it proper to appoint a receiver will not make the order appointing one a nullity.[64] In order to justify an ex parte appointment the bill or petition must allege facts showing it to be necessary,[65] and it is not sufficient merely to allege that such an emergency exists.[66] In a pending cause the court may appoint a receiver on petition in the pending cause without the filing of an original bill.[67]

Defenses and objections to appointment. The fact that a receiver has already been appointed in one action will not prevent the appointment of another receiver in another action by different parties and involving different rights, although affecting the same property;[68] and it is not a valid objection to the appointment of a receiver in a foreclosure suit that the road is in the possession of the lessee, where the lessee is a party before the court.[69] Where a creditor has a statutory right to have a receiver appointed on the return of his execution unsatisfied, it is no defense to an application by such a creditor that the equipment of the road is insufficient to enable a receiver to operate it.[70] Where, under a statute so permitting, an application for the appointment of a receiver of a railroad is refused on the filing of a proper undertaking, which undertaking is a substitute for the appointment of a receiver, the applicant is estopped from a further prosecution of his application, and the court is without authority to revoke its order at a subsequent term over the objection of defendant.[71]

Renewal of application. The refusal of an application for the appointment of a receiver is no bar to a subsequent application by leave of court, even on the same state of facts.[72]

(2) Hearing, Determination, and Order

On an application for the appointment of a receiver for a railroad the issues are limited to questions relating to the appointment of a receiver; the order or decree may stipulate as to the debts and liabilities of the company to be paid by the receiver, and it may impose such terms and conditions as are just and reasonable under the circumstances.

On an application for the appointment of a receiver the case cannot be heard on its merits as at the final hearing,[73] nor will the court take jurisdiction of and decide questions having no relation to the object for which the receiver is appointed.[74] The court may deny the application temporarily and continue the hearing pending negotiations and proceedings which may affect the propriety of making the appointment.[75] Also, on an application for a receiver to operate a railroad which has ceased operation, the court may, where the facts and circumstances warrant it, issue a mandatory injunction compelling the railroad to operate, with leave to petitioner to apply for a receiver in case the injunction is disobeyed.[76]

The court should not appoint a receiver merely on a bill filed without being supported by evidence or affidavits;[77] and, where the facts alleged as grounds for the appointment are positively denied, a receiver ordinarily will not be appointed.[78] However, while this is true where the hearing is on bill and answer only, if there is other evidence in support of the bill it will be considered, and, if on the evidence the court is of the opinion that a case is made for the appointment of a receiver, such appointment will be made notwithstanding the denials of the answer.[79]

Order or decree. It is the better practice for the order appointing the receiver to stipulate as to the debts and liabilities of the company to be paid by the receiver;[80] but it is not essential that the order for the payment of preferred debts should be made

Appointment held improper

Where on application of simple contract creditors without a lien, and of claimants for unliquidated damages due to past and future inability to ship merchandise over a railroad abandoned because of complete deterioration and insolvency, a permanent operating receiver was appointed to finance, rebuild, and operate the line, the appointment was set aside as improper and the cause retained on the docket for further proceedings with respect to the several claims asserted by creditors.—Sinclair v. at the time and as a condition of the appointment,[81] and, if not then made, it may be made afterward.[82] The order may be modified or changed by the court, from time to time as may be necessary and proper[83] and without the consent of the parties.[84]

The court appointing a receiver for a railroad may impose such terms and conditions thereon as are just and reasonable under the circumstances, and the party asking for and accepting the appointment on the conditions imposed will be bound thereby.[85] Thus the court may impose such terms and conditions with respect to the payment of outstanding debts for labor, supplies, and equipment, as a condition of making the appointment, as it may deem equitable;[86] but the court will not impose a condition which will have the effect of taking the income of a railroad in the hands of a receiver for the benefit of mortgage creditors who have a lien on it under their mortgage and using it to pay the general creditors of the road.[87]

Where a mortgagee is unwilling to agree to the conditions imposed, the foreclosure can proceed without the aid of the receivership.[88]

d. Who May Be Appointed Receiver

The person appointed as receiver for a railroad should be a person of known character and business capacity, and one who is in a position to represent impartially all the interests concerned.

The person appointed as receiver for a railroad should be a person of known character and business capacity,[89] and one who is in a position to represent impartially all the interests concerned,[90] but not necessarily a railroad man.[91] Ordinarily an officer or director,[92] or a stockholder,[93] of the road, or an officer of a parallel or competing road,[94] or a party to the suit,[95] or an attorney of one of the parties,[96] or a person pecuniarily interested in the road or under any obligation to those who are[97] will not be appointed. However, there is no inflexible rule making an officer of the company ineligible to appointment as receiver,[98] and it may not be improper to appoint an officer of the company who was in no way responsible for the condition making the receivership necessary, and whose ability and knowledge of the affairs and needs of the company commend him as a proper person to be appointed,[99] particularly where the parties interested consent to his appointment.[1]

Nonresident. Usually a resident of the jurisdiction should be appointed as receiver,[2] although the court may in its discretion appoint a nonresident[3]

e. Appointment of More than One Receiver

The court, in its discretion, may appoint more than one receiver for a railroad in the same receivership proceeding, and the fact that a receiver has been appointed for one purpose does not preclude the appointment of other receivers for different purposes.

Ordinarily more than one receiver is not appointed for the same purpose;[4] but the court may in its discretion appoint more than one,[5] although if more than one receiver is appointed and they become hostile to each other they should be removed and a single receiver appointed.[6] However, the fact that a receiver has been appointed for one purpose does not preclude the appointment of other receivers for different purposes,[7] as, for example, one receiver in foreclosure proceedings[8] and another in proceedings to forfeit the charter,[9] or in proceedings by donors and taxpayers to enforce their claims.[10]

f. Removal of Receiver

The power to remove a receiver of a railroad is vested solely in the court which appointed him and ordinarily is within its discretion

Whenever a receiver takes possession under his appointment, he holds as an officer of the court and cannot be ousted except by its order,[11] but the power to remove is incidental to the power of appointment[12] and ordinarily is a matter within the discretion of the court.[13] The court will remove the receiver for incompetency[14] or misconduct,[15] or where it appears that the appointment was procured through collusion and for a fraudulent or improper purpose;[16] and if more than one receiver is appointed and they become hostile to each other they should be removed.[17] However, the court will not remove a receiver for the reason that he is objectionable to a majority stockholder[18] or because of the misconduct of his agent.[19]

Procedure on application A person petitioning the court to remove a receiver for misconduct or incompetency should be prepared not only to prefer specific charges of wrongdoing, but to accompany them with proof,[20] but the receiver by answering the petition waives the right to object to it on the ground that the charges were not sufficiently definite.[21]

g. Termination of Receivership

A receivership of a railroad will be continued as long as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the appointment; but the railroad should be restored to its rightful owners as soon as possible, and the receiver should be discharged and the receivership terminated whenever its objects have been accomplished or its continuance is no longer necessary

A receivership of a railroad will be continued as long as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the appointment,[22] which is a matter within the sound discretion of the court.[23] However, the road should be restored to its rightful owners as soon as possible,[24] and the receiver should be discharged and the receivership terminated whenever its objects have been accomplished or its continuance is no longer necessary,[25] and, where receivers have executed the duty for which they were appointed, it is the right and duty of the party on whose application they were appointed to see to it that they are discharged if he would avoid the consequences of their continuing to act in that capacity,[26] although the court may act on its motion.[27]

Where, at the time of the receivership, one company is operating the road of another, the court will not, on discharging the receiver, determine a controversy between the companies as to the right of possession but will return the road to the company which was in possession at the time of the appointment.[28] So also, where a receiver is appointed for a railroad operating different lines of road, and a road is included under the receivership over which such company has no right of possession or control, but is interested only as a creditor and stockholder, such road will be released and discharged from the custody of the receiver.[29] An appointment will not be vacated by the appointment of the same receivers in a subsequent suit[30]

Pending determination of interstate commerce commission. Where the determination of the question whether a railroad in receivership should continue to operate or should be abandoned is within the sole jurisdiction of the interstate commerce commission, it has been held that, pending such decision, the receivership should be continued for the purpose of preserving and keeping intact the property of the railroad, and that the receivers should fulfill this obligation with a minimum of expense in salaries and otherwise,[31] and that if the commission decides the railroad should be abandoned the receivership should be dismissed, but not if the commission determines it should not be abandoned.[32]

§ 379. Effect of Appointment

The appointment of a receiver for a railroad takes the property out of the possession and control of the company and places it in the possession of the receiver, who acts as the agent or representative of the court and not as the agent or servant of the company.

The appointment of a receiver for a railroad ordinarily has the effect of taking the property out of the possession and control of the company and placing it in the hands of the receiver as the representative of the court appointing him.[33] The possession of the receiver is not that of the company, but of the court,[34] which court, in a principal receivership action, has general power and authority over the entire road,[35] even though parts of it are not situated within the district in which the court sits,[36] at least where its receivers have been likewise appointed receivers in ancillary proceedings in such other districts.[37] The receiver, on his appointment and qualification, is entitled to the possession and control of the property,[38] which the court will assist him in obtaining[39] and subsequently protect against outside interference.[40] The receiver, however, is a mere custodian of the property involved for the court.[41]

Status as a representative. The receiver of a railroad is not an agent[42] or servant[43] of the railroad company, nor are his servants its servants.[44] He is not, no matter at whose instance appointed, the agent or representative of either party to the litigation or any special interest represented therein;[45] but he holds the property as the agent or representative of the court[46] for the benefit of all who may be interested therein or ultimately found to be entitled thereto.[47]

Corporate existence of company is not terminated by the appointment of a receiver,[48] nor does such appointment effect a cessation of its franchises.[49]

Appointment of receiver does not affect or supersede company in the exercise of its corporate powers except so far as the property involved is concerned,[50] or its duty to perform any acts required of it by law which can be performed without interfering with the rights of the receiver under the terms of his appointment,[51] or its liability to perform a continuing statutory duty,[52] or its liability to be sued on any cause of action accruing prior to the appointment of the receiver,[53] or subsequently thereto if existing against the company directly and not by reason of any acts of the receiver or his servants in the operation of the road,[54] or in its right to do all things necessary to preserve its legal existence.[55] Moreover, such appointment does not affect existing liens or vested property rights[56] or change the status of unsecured into secured claims.[57] It does not divest the railroad company, that is, the corporate entity, of its title or estate in the property involved and transfer it to the receiver, in the absence of an express order to that effect by the court.[58]

Sale of property free of encumbrances. A court of equity has power, under proper circumstances, to order a receiver of a railroad to sell the property of the railroad, real or personal, free and clear of all encumbrances, and to deny a mortgagee of the railroad the right to foreclose his mortgage.[59]

Appointment cannot be collaterally attacked[60] unless the court was entirely without authority to make it.[61]

Contempt. It has been held that striking employees of a railroad which is in the hands of a receiver, who prevent, or attempt to prevent, the operation of the road, are in contempt.[62] So it has been held that to order a strike on a railroad in the hands of a receiver appointed by the federal courts is a contempt,[63] although not forbidden by any injunctional order.[64]

b. Leases generally
c. Leases and conditional sales of rolling stock

a. In General

A receiver of a railroad is not bound by contracts made by the company prior to his appointment and not constituting a lien on the property; but if the contract is advantageous he may adopt it, and he is entitled to a reasonable time to determine whether or not he should adopt it.

A receiver of a railroad is not bound by a contract made by the company prior to his appointment and not constituting a lien on the property.[65] He is not required to accept the losses thereunder, if any,[66] or obligated to pay out assets or earnings of the company thereon,[67] nor can he be compelled specifically to perform the contract,[68] or be held liable in damages for a refusal to do so,[69] unless the contract has been subsequently ratified or adopted,[70] and the receiver is entitled to a reasonable time to look into the contract and determine whether it is advantageous to adopt it.[71] The court may author-

Time held reasonable

ize a receiver to adopt and carry out an advantageous contract previously made by the company;[72] and, if necessary to hold the other party to a performance of a continuing contract, may order the receiver to pay amounts due thereunder prior to his appointment as well as those which accrue during the receivership.[73]

A receiver cannot accept the benefits of a contract without carrying out its obligations,[74] and a decree requiring another railroad to make expenditures necessary to the carrying out of a trackage agreement will be set aside where the road in receivership has insufficient assets to pay its obligations under the contract unless the other road may look elsewhere than the receivership estate for payment of the amounts due it under the contract.[75] Where a contract has been adopted, the court will see that it is carried out according to its terms,[76] although it may subsequently appear not to be an advantageous contract.[77]

Contract of prior receiver creates no legal obligation on a subsequent receiver in the same receivership[78] unless ratified by him.[79]

Right of reverter. The purchaser of railroad property at a receiver's sale on cessation of operation of the road does not acquire title to lands conveyed to the railroad to be used only for railroad purposes.[80]

b. Leases Generally

The receiver of a railroad which is operating or using another road or property as lessee is not bound by its terms and conditions; he may adopt it if it is advantageous so to do and is entitled to a reasonable time to determine that question, during which time the lessor is entitled to reasonable compensation based on the net earnings of the property leased.

The receiver of a railroad which is operating another road or using the property of another concern as lessee does not become by reason of his appointment an assignee of the lease and is not bound by its conditions[81] unless the lease is subsequently adopted,[82] but he has an election subject to the direction of the court whether or not he will adopt it.[83] He is entitled, however, to a reasonable time to investigate the conditions and determine which will be more beneficial to the interests which he represents,[84] although he may disaffirm at ers to disaffirm traffic agreement with another railroad, made within seven months after receivership in foreclosure suit, and eleven months after appointment of receivers, was held within reasonable time—General Finance Corporation v New York State Rys., supra.

Facts held not to show adoption

(1) Failure of receivers to list leases as being subject to disaffirmance was held not to establish that they had been impliedly adopted—Texas Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co, C C.A Ill, 126 F.2d 83.

(2) Fact that a railroad's receivers had always paid dividends on lessor's stock was held not to establish adoption of lease where dividends were paid out of rentals collected from purchaser of railroad's property, and property had been sold because not enough revenue was realized during period of receivership to pay amounts due upon railroad's mortgages—Texas Co. v. Chicago & A. R Co., supra.

Adoption held not required

Evidence was held not to require the railroad's receivers to adopt leases on the theory that the receivers were bound to preserve the property as an entirety.—Texas Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co., C.C.A.Ill., 126 F.2d 83.

once;[85] and the time for his rejection or adoption of the lease may be extended by the court.[86] The possession and operation of the leased road by the receiver does not make the lease binding on him if they were without any manifestation of an intention to adopt the lease, or opposition to the right of the lessor to resume possession,[87] or where the use of the leased property and payment of rentals thereon were made under court orders expressly reserving the right of the receivers to renounce the lease notwithstanding such use and payment, and expressly providing that such use and payment should not constitute an adoption of the contract.[88]

Generally it is a matter of necessity that the receiver shall take at least a temporary possession of a leased road,[89] and the lessor ordinarily is entitled to compensation for the use of the road while in the hands of the receiver,[90] and certainly where there are net earnings which may be so applied.[91] He is not entitled, however, to the rent stipulated in the lease,[92] the amount and rate of compensation in such case depending on the circumstances under which the receiver took and held possession;[93] and ordinarily the equities of the case will be satisfied by the receiver turning over to the lessor, should the lease be rejected, the net earnings by him during the period of provisional operation.[94]

If no intention was manifested to adopt the lease and no objection or obstacle interposed to the lessor's right to recover possession, the receiver will not be liable for the rents stipulated but only for the fair and reasonable value of the use of the property,[95] and in such case the court ordinarily will limit the amount to be paid according to the net earnings of the road,[96] and refuse the payment of rents where there are no earnings over and above operating expenses.[97] In any event, the lessor may at any time ask the court to direct a return of the road to it, if the receiver does not pay the stipulated rent[98] or if the lessor is not willing to have the receiver operate the road for less.[99]

A receiver will be liable according to the terms of the lease where the lessor was not at the time of the appointment entitled to demand possession, and the court did not order the possession restored but indicated by its orders that the rent would be paid,[1] or where the lessor, being entitled to demand posses-

General order as applicable to lease

(1) Where court orders extending time within which railroad's receivers could reject or affirm contracts of railroad contained no exceptions, such orders were applicable to lease covering property leased to railroad, notwithstanding lease was made subject of specific order, especially where latter order was made because of expenditures and was definite in reserving to court right thereafter to direct receivers to adopt or disaffirm lease—Texas Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co, supra.

(2) Decree granting limited time for disavowal of contracts in general was applicable to lease covering property which had been leased to railroad notwithstanding lease was not specifically referred to in decree, since, where all of a class are referred to generally, all are included unless specifically excepted.—Texas Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co., supra.

Right to object

Stockholders of lessor, who had profited by court orders extending time for railroad's receivers to assume or reject lease, and who, if they had so desired, could have been made parties of record to the orders, which were unappealed, could not complain that the court had granted an unreasonable length of time to receivers in which to reject contracts—Texas Co v. Chicago & A. R. Co, supra.

Authorization of interstate commerce commission not required

A purchaser of railroad in receivership was not bound to obtain authority from interstate commerce commission to discontinue operation of property which had been leased to railroad prior to receivership before disaffirming the leases.—Texas Co v Chicago & A R Co, supra.

Facts held not to preclude right to reject lease

(1) Fact that purchaser of railroad in receivership had expended money on the betterment of property which had been leased to railroad before receivership, was held not to preclude purchaser from disaffirming lease as against lessor and its stockholders—Texas Co v. Chicago & A R. Co, C.C.A.Ill, 126 F 2d 83

(2) Fact that holder of stock of purchaser and purchaser, as owner of majority stock of lessor, were chargeable with a fiduciary duty to exercise utmost good faith in dealings affecting lessor, did not preclude purchaser from disaffirming a lease between lessor and the railroad purchased, where acts of receivers, holder of stock, and purchaser were in accordance with decrees of receivership court which had knowledge of all facts, and lessor had delayed several years before objecting to procedure concerning lease—Texas Co. v. Chicago & A. R Co, supra.

Adoption held not shown

(1) Purchaser's application to interstate commerce commission for authority to purchase properties of railroad in receivership and proceedings before commission regarding such application were held not to constitute an "adoption" by purchaser of a lease to the railroad which was in receivership.—Texas Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co., supra.

(2) Purchaser of railroad in receivership was held not to have impliedly adopted leases to railroad by its acts in operating leased property after its purchase from receivers, with payment of rent pursuant to leases and without renunciation or notice thereof, in view of orders of receivership court with respect to extensions of time within which receivers might affirm or reject contracts of railroad.—Texas Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co., supra.

Estoppel to deny adoption held not shown

Purchaser of railroad in receivership was held not estopped to deny adoption of leases by its operation of the leased property and full payment of rent pursuant to the leases, as against stockholders of lessor, where stockholders had not been misled and had not altered their positions to their detriment as result of purchaser's acts—Texas Co. v. Chicago & A. R Co., supra.

Amount payable

(1) Where receivers of lessee railroad and purchaser of railroad at foreclosure sale operated properties of lessor railroad for eighteen years and paid dividends on stock of lessor railroad as provided in lease before electing not to assume lease, purchaser was estopped to ask an accounting for difference between net earnings of properties operated and amount paid under lease and from denying liability for unpaid amounts which accrued under lease before election—James Blackstone Memorial Library Ass'n v. Alton R. Co, 43 N E 2d 695, 316 Ill App. 70.

(2) Where purchaser of lessee railroad delayed payment of dividends to stockholders of lessor railroad under terms of lease of railroad property until after stockholders of lessor railroad instituted legal proceedings, in absence of showing that full amount sued for was tendered in full payment or accepted conditioned on release of accrued interest and costs, payment of full amount sued for did not relieve purchasing railroad of obligation to pay interest. —James Blackstone Memorial Library Ass'n v. Alton R Co., supra.

Persons entitled to rent payments

In action to recover dividends payable to stockholders of lessor railroad under terms of lease, which accrued before purchaser elected not to assume lease, record of stock ledger and showing that plaintiffs had received previous dividend payments and admission by purchaser that all dividends actually paid were paid to stockholders of record of lessor railroad, established prima facie that plaintiffs were stockholders of record and entitled to dividends—James Blackstone Memorial Library Ass'n v. Alton R. Co., supra.

c. Leases and Conditional Sales of Rolling Stock

The receiver of a railroad is not an assignee, or bound by the terms, of car-trust leases, conditional sales contracts, and leases with provisions for final purchase of rolling stock unless he subsequently adopts them.

The general rules stated supra subdivisions a, b of this section apply to what are termed car-trust leases,[11] conditional sales contracts,[12] and leases with provisions for final purchase of the property by the railroad,[13] under which rolling stock is delivered to a railroad company. The receiver is not an assignee of such contract or lease and is not bound by its terms—[14] although the company may still be liable thereunder—[15] unless he subsequently adopts it,[16] and he is entitled to a reasonable time in which to decide whether or not it should be adopted.[17]

The owner of the equipment is, however, ordinarily entitled to demand its possession,[18] and to compensation for its use while in the hands of the receiver,[19] which ordinarily is determined not according to the terms of the lease, but according to the fair and reasonable value of such use.[20] The court may authorize the adoption of the lease or contract,[21] and, if adopted, the receiver is bound by its covenants and conditions,[22] and liable for the rent stipulated therein,[23] which becomes a part of the operating expenses and a preferred claim superior to the lien of a mortgage.[24]

As a general rule a railroad in the hands of a receiver should be kept up and maintained as a going concern, but he should not continue to operate it where its continued operation will result in the exhaustion of its assets. The cost of operation ordinarily should be paid out of income.

Owing to the peculiar nature of a railroad, both the public convenience and the private interests in the property frequently demand, that, when in the hands of a receiver, it shall be kept up and maintained as a going concern,[25] and in determining whether the continuing operation of a railroad under receivership should be ordered considerations of public interest are controlling on the court.[26] Railroad receivers, however, are generally subject to the rule that a receiver should not continue the operation of a business at a loss where continued operation will result in exhaustion of its assets.[27] Hence, a railroad in the hands of a receiver should not be compelled to operate at a continuing loss because of lack of traffic or the dilapidated condition of its rolling stock and roadbed unless cessation of its operation is contrary to its charter,[28] nor should operation be authorized when the chance of success is nothing more than a gamble.[29]

In the operation of a railroad by a receiver much must be left to the discretion of the court which appointed him where it knows not only what pro-

To protect all interests

A receiver's operation of a railroad is not in the interest of creditors and stockholders alone, but equally for the purpose of attempting to preserve the service to the public.—Reconstruction Finance Corp. v. Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co., C.C.A.Ark., 122 F 2d 326.

Customary situation

Except in cases where it is temporarily financially embarrassed and the temporary stay of creditor pressure is essential to its preservation, the power to appoint operating receivers is most commonly, if not exclusively, exercised in cases of financial embarrassment or impending insolvency of railroads.—Sinclair v Moore Cent. Before decreeing operation of a railroad by a receiver, the court should ascertain whether such operation will pay expenses and will be in the interest of conservation rather than conducive to dissipation of the property.—Sinclair v. Moore Cent. R. Co, 45 S E 2d 555, 228 N.C 389.

ceedings have been had in court, but also what has been done outside of court in the management, maintenance, and operation of the property.[30] Although ordinarily the court should not undertake anything in the nature of a new and distinct enterprise,[31] it is frequently proper for it to authorize something more than the mere operation of the property placed in the hands of the receiver, not as a new enterprise, but as a means of better preserving the property or operating it more profitably, such as the leasing of another road,[32] or even further works of construction.[33] The cost of the operation of a railroad by a receiver ordinarily should be paid out of its income,[34] and should be whenever the net earnings of the road are sufficient,[35] and under some statutes the income of the railroad should be applied to the payment of the incidental expenses necessary to the carrying on of its business.[36]

Where receivers of a lessor railroad operate a lessee railroad under orders which provide for their prospective modification on notice, the bondholders of the lessee railroad have been held not entitled to have the orders modified retrospectively,[37] and the prospective modification of the orders has been held to be within the discretion of the court.[38]

Differences between receiver and his employees. The court may require a receiver to make such contracts or arrangements with respect to rates of wages and conditions of employment as it may deem proper,[39] at least in the absence of a statute providing for the settlement of labor disputes by some other tribunal or method,[40] but statutes must be complied with which preclude wage cuts or changes until after a specified board or tribunal has mediated the matter.[41] A federal statute imposing restrictions

38. U.S.—Godfrey v. Powell, supra.

Modification held properly refused

Where bondholders of lessee railroad, which had been operated by lessor railroad's receivers under an operating agreement, had received benefit of lessee railroad's earnings by increase in upset price stipulated on mortgage foreclosure sale of lessee railroad's properties, there was no abuse of discretion in denying bondholders' request, based on existence of earnings from operations of lessee railroad, that operating orders be modified.—Godfrey v. Powell, supra.

Modification after sale of lessee road

Where receivers of lessor railroad operated lessee railroad under operating agreement and probable future profits from operation of lessee railroad's property had been considered in fixing upset price on mortgage foreclosure sale of lessee railroad's assets, and order denying motion of bondholders of lessee for modification of operating agreement had been affirmed, the matter was closed up to date of sale, but motion to modify filed after confirmation of sale was not prejudiced by adverse judgment on prior motion.—Godfrey v. Powell, C.C.A. Fla., 155 F.2d 51.

Persons entitled to ask modification

Where receivers of lessor railroad operated lessee railroad under operating agreement, after confirmation of mortgage foreclosure sale of assets of lessee railroad, bondholders of lessee railroad were not entitled to prospective modification of operating agreement so as to enable them to share equitably in earnings, since after the sale and its confirmation the bondholders had no interest in lessee's properties and their operation, but bondholders' rights were altogether against proceeds of sale.—Godfrey v. Although a receivership judge may have the duty of operating a railroad property in his custody, he is not thereby freed from other responsibilities that devolve upon him as a federal court sitting in equity.—Grand International Brotherhood on any change in agreement affecting wages applies to interstate railroads being operated by a receiver [42]

It has been held under federal legislation providing that no reduction of wages shall be made without authority of the court, and after twenty days notice to the employees, that all persons engaged in operating railroad trains in train service on interstate railroads at the time the receiver takes charge are entitled to such notice,[43] but that no other employees are within its scope.[44] An order for a reduction of wages made without the notice required by such statute is invalid,[45] and if a receiver announces a reduction on the authority of such order the employees may either continue to serve and demand compensation at the former wage[46] or treat the announcement as a breach of the relation and terminate their service;[47] but if they strike they terminate their standing, as employees and lose their right to object.[48] Such statute does not, however, preclude a receiver from making voluntary contracts with the old employees or with new ones for a smaller wage than that theretofore paid.[49] A receiver by adopting a wage scale equivalent to that recommended by the federal labor board does not thereby impliedly contract to continue it until the labor board shall make a different recommendation.[50]

Power of administrative body to control abandonment. Under some statutes the power to order or permit the receiver of a railroad to abandon its operation wholly[51] or in part[52] is vested exclusively in an administrative commission or body other than the court which appointed the receiver.

Sale on condition requiring operation It has been held that the sale of a railroad in the hands of a receiver cannot be required to be on condition that it continue to be operated.[53]

§ 382. —— Powers and Duties of Receiver

a. In general
b. To enter into contracts
c. To make or accept lease

a. In General

A receiver of a railroad has such powers, and only such, as are validly conferred on him by the court appointing him or are prescribed by statute; generally he possesses considerable discretionary power with respect to the ordinary affairs of the road and its operation.

The authority of the receiver of a railroad is limited to such powers as the court appointing him is authorized to confer,[54] and which are in fact of Locomotive Engineers v. Morphy, C C A.Vt, 109 F.2d 576, certiorari denied Morphy v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 60 S Ct. 1078, 310 U S 635, 84 L Ed 1404.

Pending jurisdiction of board

Under statute precluding carrier from imposing wage cut until after National Mediation Board has given notice that its mediatory efforts have failed, railroad is without power to impose wage cut, and receivership judge is without power to order carrier's receiver to do so, as long as board pretends to retain jurisdiction and refuses to give notice that its efforts have failed—Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers v. Morphy, C C.A.Vt., 109 F 2d 576, certiorari denied Morphy v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 60 S Ct. 1078, 310 U.S 635, 84 L Ed. 1404.

Construction of board's decision

Even if letter of National Mediation Board was ambiguous as to whether board had decided to retain jurisdiction or was giving notice of failure of mediation, receivership court to which carrier's receiver applied for authority to reduce wages was not authorized to construe the letter, since the ambiguity was one which could readily have been dissipated by the board itself.—Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers v. Morphy, C.C.A. Vt, 109 F 2d 576, certiorari denied Morphy v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 60 S Ct. 1078, 310 U S. 635, 84 L Ed. 1404.

Order withholding proportion of wages

(1) A court order directing the receiver of an interstate railroad to withhold a specified per cent of employees' wages, the amounts withheld to constitute only general claims against the receivership, "affected" wages so as to require compliance with Railway Labor Act imposing restrictions on change in agreement affecting wages; and, since the order was in substance a wage cut, it was unauthorized where Railway Labor Act had not been complied with.—Burke v. Morphy, C. C A.Vt, 109 F.2d 572, certiorari denied Morphy v. Burke, 60 S Ct. 1078, 310 U S. 635, 84 L Ed. 1404.

(2) The action of the receiver, under such an order, is also invalid, and claims for wages withheld like other claims for receivership expenses have precedence over mortgage bonds of the railroad and are required to be paid accordingly—Burke v. Morphy, C.C.A Vt., 109 F 2d 572, certiorari denied Morphy v. Burke, 60 S Ct. 1078, 310 U.S. 635, 84 L Ed 1404.

conferred by the order appointing him,[55] or such as may be reasonably implied therefrom[56] or such as are prescribed by statute where his powers are so defined,[57] and he cannot, without the direction of the court, incur expenses on account of the property in his hands beyond what are necessary for its preservation, use, and operation as contemplated by his appointment.[58] Generally speaking, the court may order or authorize the receiver to do any acts with respect to the preservation and operation of the road which are within the corporate powers of the company;[59] but the receiver cannot exercise, nor can the court authorize him to exercise, any powers or franchises beyond those of the company to whose possession he succeeds.[60]

A receiver of a railroad, although the extent of his authority independently of any express previous order or authority from the court cannot well be precisely defined,[61] usually is clothed with considerable discretionary power with respect to the ordinary affairs of the road and its operation and is not obliged first to submit all matters to the court,[62] and, where he conforms to the established usages and customs with respect to the operation of railroads,[63] the court will subsequently confirm such of his acts as it would have authorized in the first instance had authority been asked.[64]

The public policy of the jurisdiction in which the railroad is located controls operation of it by a receiver.[65] He is subject, in the same way as the company itself was prior to the receivership, to the provisions of a public utilities statute[66] and to statutes regulating the use and operation of railroads;[67] and federal receivers, especially in view of a federal statute so providing, must operate a railroad according to the laws of the state in which the railroad is situated[68] unless the state statute expressly excludes them from its application.[69] Receivers have been held subject to the penal provisions of statutes[70] except, it has been held, where the penalty is by the terms of the statute imposed on the corporation.[71]

Particular statutes

(1) State statutes relating to speed of trains, abandonment of lines, liability for negligence, the medium in which wages are paid, and other similar police regulations, must be obeyed by receivers of a railroad.—Webster & Atlas Nat. Bank of Boston v. Palmer, C.C.A.Conn., 111 F.2d 215, reversed on other grounds Palmer v. Webster & Atlas Nat. Bank of Boston, 61 S.Ct. 542, 312 U.S. 156, 85 L.Ed. 642, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 728, 312 U.S. 714, 85 L.Ed. 1145.

(2) Where state statutes require railroads to pay wages weekly and in lawful money, an order of receivership court directing interstate railroad receiver to withhold specified per cent of employees' wages, the amounts withheld to constitute only general claims against the receivership, was erroneous, since it violated the statutes.—Burke v. Morphy, C.C.A.Vt., 109 F.2d 572, certiorari denied Morphy v. Burke, 60 S.Ct. 1078, 310 U.S. 635, 84 L.Ed. 1404.

Discrimination as to rates and facilities. A receiver has no right unjustly to discriminate as to rates and facilities between different connecting carriers[72] or between different shippers,[73] and the court may make such orders as are necessary to compel the receiver properly to perform his duties as a common carrier and to prevent discrimination,[74] and may compel a receiver to repay amounts exacted by unjust discrimination.[75]

Creation of indebtedness. The court, when necessary, may authorize a receiver to incur an indebtedness for purposes essential to the operation of the railroad,[76] such as necessary repairs[77] or the purchase of rolling stock.[78]

Lien. Indebtedness incurred by the receiver of a railroad in its operation is a lien against the property of the railroad,[79] and it has been held that he may make such indebtedness a first lien on the property.[80] Where expenditures for additions and betterments are made to a lessee railroad by the receiver of the lessor railroad with funds of the receivership, with the intention of claiming a lien for them, it is proper for him to claim such a lien and it should be allowed.[81]

Eminent domain. A receiver cannot exercise the power of eminent domain in behalf of a railroad without authority from the court,[82] and it has been doubted whether the court may authorize a receiver to do so,[83] but it has been held that the court may do so when necessary to complete an undertaking previously commenced by the company and which is essential to the profitable operation of the road.[84]

Authority of receiver's agent. Where the receiver does, as he may and in many cases must, act through an agent,[85] it will be presumed that an agent occupying a certain position under a receiver is invested with the same authority as though he were in the employ of the railroad company.[86]

b. To Enter into Contracts

The court may authorize a receiver of a railroad to make contracts necessary for the preservation and operation of the road which are within the corporate powers of the company, and ordinarily he is invested with a broad discretion as to the making of such contracts.

The court may authorize a receiver to make contracts necessary for the preservation and op-

Increase of betterment claims

Increase of betterment claims of receivers against lessee railroad, which increase was a lien against proceeds of sale of properties of lessee railroad, did not harm bondholders of lessee railroad where, by terms of sale, increase was to be added to upset price, which purchaser bid at sale.—Godfrey v Powell, C. C.A.Fla., 155 F.2d 51.

Improper basis of claim

Lien awarded receivers of railroad, operating lessee railroad under an operating agreement, on lessee railroad's properties to secure repayment of expenditures for betterments and denial of request for modification of operating agreement could not be justified merely because of addition to upset price stipulated on mortgage foreclosure sale of lessee railroad's properties of an amount equal to allowances for betterments plus an amount on account of earnings of lessee railroad on which request for modification of operating agreement was based.—Godfrey v. Powell, C.C.A.Fla., 150 F 2d 486, certiorari denied 66 S Ct. 272, two cases, 326 U S 779, 90 L Ed 471.

Evidence

Evidence was held insufficient to establish that claim of lien was made merely to defeat claims of some of bondholders of lessee railroad to greater share of proceeds from mortgage foreclosure sale of lessee railroad's properties or that improvements were made out of earnings from lessee railroad's operation.—Godfrey v. Powell, C C A Fla., 150 F 2d 486, certiorari denied 66 S Ct 272, two cases, 326 U S. 779, 90 L Ed 471.

eration of the road which are within the corporate powers of the company,[87] and ordinarily the receiver is invested with a broad discretion as to the making of such contracts[88] and is not required in all cases first to procure authority from the court.[89] While the court clearly has the right to review the action of the receiver and disapprove and disallow any contract which does not meet with its approval,[90] ordinarily it will recognize and enforce all contracts made in good faith and for a proper purpose, although not previously authorized,[91] even where the contract may seem to be improvident if it has been fully performed in good faith and without notice on the part of the other party as to its improvident character.[92]

The court will decline to sanction the exercise of discretion on the part of receivers in respect of large outlays[93] or contracts extending beyond the receivership,[94] where such contracts are contemplated, previous authority of the court should be sought.[95] Where the contract has not been performed and the court refuses to order it carried out because of its improvident character, it may allow the other party compensation for expenditures made in good faith preparatory to carrying out the contract on its part.[96]

Receiver may contract through agents,[97] but he cannot delegate to an agent any greater powers than he himself possesses.[98]

c. To Make or Accept Leases

The court, in a proper case, may authorize the receiver of a railroad to lease and operate another road, but the receiver has no authority to make a lease without the approval of the court.

The court may, whenever essential to a more profitable operation of the road in the hands of the receiver, authorize the receiver to lease and operate another road;[99] but a receiver has no authority to make any lease without the approval of the court.[1] A statutory receiver appointed by the governor of the state under a statute granting aid to the company and providing for the appointment of a receiver to operate the road in case of a default in the payment on the part of the railroad company cannot, in the absence of statutory authority, lease the road to another company,[2] even with the consent and approval of the governor.[3]

§ 383. —— Liability of Receiver in General

As a general rule the liability of a receiver of a railroad is official rather than personal.

In the absence of any personal or individual misconduct,[4] or assumption of liability on the part of the receiver,[5] and where he does not assume to act otherwise than as an officer of the court in the operation of the road,[6] his liability is official rather than personal,[7] and an action against the receiver as such is in effect a proceeding in rem, affecting only the fund or property held by him by virtue of his office.[8]

After confirmation of a sale of the property in his hands, if the receiver retains possession thereof, not as an officer of the court, but in his individual capacity, he is personally liable for any injuries occurring in the operation of the road during such period and prior to his delivery of the property to the purchaser.[9]

Actions against receivers. General rules apply to actions against receivers of railroads.[10] In an action against a person as receiver of a railroad, his appointment must be proved;[11] but, where it is shown that he was receiver of the road, it will be presumed that he was discharging the duties imposed on him by that relation and was operating the road,[12] and the same statutory presumption of negligence will arise as in the case of the company itself operating the road.[13] If plaintiff fails to prove facts necessary to charge the receiver with liability, the court should direct a verdict in favor of the receiver.[14] In an action against a receiver, where he is liable only as receiver, the judgment should be entered against him in his official capacity and not personally.[15] Under a federal statute dispensing with the necessity of obtaining leave to sue a receiver appointed by a federal court, permission of the appointing court to sue a federal receiver for a railroad company is not required.[16]

Process and appearance. Statutory rules governing the service of process apply in actions against receivers of railroads.[17] In an action which was erroneously brought against the railroad company instead of against the receivers of the company, service of process on a railroad agent who at the time the summons was served on him was actually an agent of the receivers does not constitute service on the receivers.[18] Where an action is brought against a railroad company on a cause accruing before the appointment of a receiver, and service is made on a local agent of the receiver, the receiver should appear and defend for the company.[19] In a mortgage foreclosure suit in a state court, service of process on the railroad company, or the appearance of attorneys for the company, is not service on, or an appearance for, the company's federal court receivers who were not made parties to the suit.[20]

Garnishment. A receiver of a railroad, including a receiver appointed by a federal court, has been held not subject to garnishment with respect to wages due an employee except by leave of the court which appointed him.[21]

§ 384. —— Liability for Injuries Growing Out of Operation

a. In general
b. Failure to fence and erect cattle guards
c. Fires
d. Prior acts or omissions of company

a. In General

A receiver of a railroad company who is operating the road and exercising its franchise is subject, in his official capacity, to the same liability for injuries and damages caused by its operation as the railway company would be if it were operating the road.

A receiver of a railroad company who is exercising the franchises of such company and operating its road is subject, in his official capacity, to the same rules of liability as the company would be if it were operating the road by virtue of the

In justice court
In order to sustain summons in justice court suit against receiver, it is not necessary that receiver have office in district wherein suit is brought or that such fact be alleged in summons, but it is sufficient to allege that railroad company has office, on which service can be perfected, in such district.—Pidcock v. same franchises,[22] and he cannot claim exemption from liability in his official character on the ground that he is a public officer or officer of the court[23] or the agent or trustee of persons not directly liable.[24] Thus, in his official character he is liable as a common carrier for injuries to passengers during his control of the road[25] or for loss or delay of goods in transit,[26] and generally for the negligence of his servants in the operation of the road.[27]

Where a receiver of one road leases and operates another as receiver, he is in his official capacity liable for injuries due to the unsafe condition of the track of such road,[28] but a receiver of a company which furnishes cars to another company under a traffic arrangement whereby the latter company is to operate them is not liable for injuries resulting from such operation upon the tracks of the latter company.[29] Since an action against the receiver as such is virtually a proceeding in rem affecting the fund or property in his hands by virtue of his office, as considered supra § 383, it follows that, where one receiver resigns and another is appointed by the court, an action may be maintained against the new receiver for a tort of the servants of his predecessor in the same receivership.[30] However, a federal receiver of a railroad formerly constituting part of a larger system, which larger system was formerly under receivership, is not liable to be sued in another court, without leave of the appointing court, for wrongful acts committed in the operation of the road by receivers of the larger system.[31]

Under statutes. Receivers,[32] including receivers appointed by a federal court,[33] usually are subject in their official capacity to a liability imposed by statute for injuries caused by the negligent operation of railroads or growing out of a failure to comply with statutes governing their operation and for injuries caused by the violation of statutes requiring railroads to maintain suitable drains and ditches to carry off surface water.[34]

Liability for acts of lessee. Where a receiver of a lessor railroad adopts an outstanding lease made by it, he is liable for the tortious acts of the lessee committed after his appointment,[35] and even if such a lease is not expressly adopted he will be liable after a reasonable time for making an election has passed.[36]

b. Failure to Fence and Erect Cattle Guards

Receivers operating railroads have been held subject to a statutory liability for injuries to animals resulting from a failure to fence the road.

Under the statutes imposing liability on railroad companies for injury to animals due to failure to fence the road, receivers in control of, and operating, railroads have been held liable for such injuries,[37] and they have been held liable to the double indemnity provisions of such statutes.[38] Receivers have likewise been held liable for a statutory penalty for failure to maintain cattle guards, recoverable by an owner or tenant of inclosed lands.[39]

c. Fires

A receiver of a railroad is liable as such for damages by fire caused by negligence in the operation of the road during the receivership

A receiver as such is liable for damages by fire caused by negligence in the operation of the road during the receivership,[40] and this notwithstanding a statute creating priorities, as far as funds come into his hands, does not take account of such a claim.[41] Receivers are also subject to the statutory liability for fires, although the statute does not in terms apply to them.[42]

d. Prior Acts or Omissions of Company

A receiver of a railroad is not liable for torts of the company committed before his appointment, even though he is given authority to defend suits against the railroad.

Although it has been held that such an action may be maintained where the permission of the court is first obtained,[43] ordinarily it is held that a receiver is not liable for a tort of the company committed before his appointment,[44] notwithstanding he is given authority by the order appointing him to defend suits against the railroad[45] or to intervene in pending suits;[46] and it is error to substitute a receiver after his appointment as defendant in a suit pending against the company on such prior cause of action.[47] A receiver, however, may be liable for injuries occurring after his appointment from a previously existing defective condition of the track or roadbed,[48] it being his duty, on taking over the road, to use due care in inspecting it for the discovery of defects;[49] and it has been held that it is no defense to such action that he had not been in possession for a sufficient length of time to repair the defect.[50]

§ 385. —— Liability of Company

a. In general
b. For failure to fence and injuries to animals
c. Where railroad leased

a. In General

A railroad company is not liable for the acts of a receiver, or his servants or agents, in the operation of the railroad, where the road is in the full possession and control of the receiver.

Since, as discussed supra § 379, where a railroad has been duly placed by a court of competent jurisdiction in the hands of a receiver who is in full possession and control of the road, the possession of the receiver is the possesion of the court and not that of the railroad company, and the receiver is not the agent or servant of the company, or his servants its servants, the company is not liable for the acts of the receiver,[51] or for those of his servants or agents,[52] in the operation of the road, and the railroad company should be protected from litigation.[53]

It cannot, however, properly be stated without qualification that a railroad company is not liable for the acts of a receiver of its road under any circumstances,[54] for the company will be liable if the receiver is not in exclusive possession and control but jointly with the company,[55] or where the company is permitted to retain the actual control and management of the road, and the functions of the receiver are restricted to the receipt of the net earnings,[56] or if the receiver was appointed at the instance of the company for the purpose of putting its property temporarily beyond the reach of creditors, and enabling it to tide over financial difficulties.[57] However, the fact that a company acquiesces in the action of a court of another state in the appointment of receivers for its lessee and permits them to operate its road does not deprive it of the right to show that at the time of the injury complained of its road was in the exclusive possession and control of the same receivers under an appointment by a court of competent jurisdiction in its own state in an action against it.[58] An action may be maintained against a company for an injury sustained prior to the appointment of a receiver, although at the time the suit is brought the road is in the hands of the receiver.[59]

In case of a continuing injury from the operation of the road, the company is liable only for such damages as resulted from acts complained of prior to its being placed in the hands of the receiver.[60]

Where appointment was void or collusive A railroad company is liable for the acts of a receiver whom it permits to take and operate its road under an appointment which is invalid for lack of jurisdiction of the court,[61] or where such appointment was made through fraud or collusion on the part of the company,[62] whether or not the court had jurisdiction,[63] the receiver being regarded in either case as the agent of the company.[64] If in such case an action has been instituted against the receiver alone, the company may by amendment be made a defendant.[65]

b. For Failure to Fence and Injuries to Animals

In some jurisdictions it has been held under statutes imposing liability on railroad companies for injuries to animals due to a failure to fence the road that railroad companies whose roads are in the possession of, and being operated by, receivers are liable for such injuries.

It has been held under some statutes imposing liability on railroad companies for injury to animals due to a failure to fence the road that a company is liable for such injuries although its road at the time was in the possession of, and being operated by, a receiver,[66] while under other statutes a contrary conclusion has been reached.[67] Where the company is held liable notwithstanding the receivership, such action may be brought against the company in a state court although the receivership is a federal one.[68]

c. Where Railroad Leased

The lessor of a railroad operated by receivers of the lessee is liable for wrongs and injuries caused by its operation while in the possession and control of such receivers, in cases where the lessor company would be liable for the acts of its lessee, but a lessee company is not liable for the acts of its own receiver while in the exclusive control and operation of the leased road

The lessor of a railroad operated by receivers of the lessee has been held liable for wrongs and injuries caused by its operation while in the possession and control of such receivers, in cases where the lessor company would be liable for the acts of its lessee,[69] at least where the control of the receiver is not exclusive,[70] although there is authority to support the contrary view where the control of the receivers is exclusive.[71] Under the rule that a company in the hands of a receiver, who is in possession and control of its road, is not liable for the acts of such receiver, as considered supra subdivision a of this section, it has been held that a lessee company is not liable for the acts of its own receiver while in the exclusive control and operation of the leased road.[72]

A railroad which operates the property of another railroad as agent for its receiver is liable for the negligent operation thereof by its own subagents or employees.[73] claims arising during the receivership is considered infra sections 387-388.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

After his final discharge by the court, a receiver of a railroad cannot be held liable for negligence in the operation of the road during the receivership unless he was personally at fault.

After his final discharge by the court, a receiver cannot be held liable for negligence in the operation of the road during the receivership[74] where he was not personally at fault;[75] and an action brought against him to enforce such an alleged liability will be discontinued or dismissed as to him.[76] A state statute providing that receivers may be sued after their discharge does not apply to a federal receiver.[77] However, until finally discharged, the receiver as such is liable and may be sued,[78] notwithstanding he has turned over the possession of the property to the company or persons entitled thereto[79]

If discharged during pendency of action, no judgment can be rendered against the receiver in his official capacity[80] unless otherwise provided by the decree or order of discharge[81] However, if a cause of action exists in favor of plaintiff, the action does not abate, as considered in Abatement and Revival § 110 e, but should be discontinued or dismissed as to the receiver and continued on the substitution of the proper party defendant,[82] and this procedure may be directed by the order discharging the receiver and directing a return of the property.[83] In the case of federal receivers, however, state statutes providing that pending actions shall not abate or be discontinued as to a receiver on his discharge are not applicable.[84]

§ 388. —— Liability of Company

a. In general
b. Where property returned without sale
c. Where property sold
d. Actions

a. In General

A railroad company ordinarily is not liable after the discharge of a receiver of the road for any claims arising against the receiver as such during the receivership.

Since, when a receiver for a railroad has been duly appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction, the property is in the custody of the court, and the receiver is the agent of the court and not of the company, as considered supra § 379, the company ordinarily is not liable after the discharge of the receiver for any claims arising against the receiver as such during the receivership,[85] whether in contract or in tort,[86] although the receivership was only temporary and the property was returned to the company on its termination[87] Thus ordinarily the company is not bound by contracts of the receiver,[88] and it cannot enforce against a third person a contract made by such person with the receiver.[89] However, a railroad company will be liable on a contract made by it, although at the time of the execution of the contract the road was under the control of a receiver duly appointed;[90] and a judgment rendered against the company while the road was in the hands of a receiver operates as a lien on its property, and, if kept alive, may be enforced against the property after the discharge of the receiver and its return to the company.[91]

b. Where Property Returned without Sale

Ordinarily a railroad company, after the termination of the receivership and the return of the property to it, is not liable for injuries from the operation of the road by the receiver unless such liability was assumed by it as a condition for the return of the property, or was imposed by statute or the order restoring the property and discharging the receiver, or unless revenues collected by the receiver during his operation of the road have been diverted by placing them in betterments or are turned over to the company without a sale.

Ordinarily a railroad company, after the termination of the receivership and the return of its property to it, is not liable for injuries from the operation of the road by the receiver.[92] However, the company is liable for such injuries, provided no rights of third persons have intervened,[93] where such liability was assumed by it as a condition for the return of the property,[94] or was created by valid conditions imposed by the order restoring the property and discharging the receiver,[95] or was imposed by statutes creating such liability,[96] or where revenues collected by the receiver during his operation of the road have been diverted by him by placing them in betterments or are turned over to the company without a sale.[97]

The court in such cases has no power to make any order on returning the property limiting the liability of the company to claims established by intervention in the suit in which the receiver was appointed,[98] or presented to, and approved by, the court making such order,[99] or limiting the time within which such claims must be established,[1] or to make any decree in a proceeding to which claimant was not a party which would deprive him of the right to seek his remedy in any court of competent jurisdiction,[2] and within the time prescribed by law.[3] The company is not liable in any case on any cause of action which could not have been enforced against the receiver had he remained in possession.[4]

c. Where Property Sold

A railroad company which purchases and pays for its railroad at a receiver's sale is not liable for claims against the receiver growing out of his operation of the road unless such liability was assumed by it as a condition of the purchase or was imposed by statute.

Where a railroad company purchases at a receiver's sale, and pays for, property which it formerly owned, although the purchase may include money on hand and current assets, it will not be liable for a claim against the receiver growing out of his operation of the road,[5] where such liability was not assumed by it as a condition of the purchase[6] or where the sale is not shown to have been collusive.[7] However, under a statute providing that a purchaser of the property and franchise of a railroad company shall take subject to all liabilities, a company which purchased a railroad in receivership has been held liable for damages to goods caused by the negligence of employees of the receiver.[8]

d. Actions

(1) In general

(3) Evidence
(4) Trial, verdict, and judgment

(1) In General

Actions against a railroad company after the discharge of a receiver of the road to recover claims that arose during the receivership need not be instituted in the court that appointed the receiver, and the receiver is not a necessary party to the action.

Where the return of its property without sale imposes a liability on the company, the claim need not be adjusted in the court appointing the receiver, but an action may be brought in another court having jurisdiction.[9] The court which appointed the receiver has no right to require that the claim shall be established by intervention in the original suit.[10] The receiver is not a necessary party in such an action against the company after the receivership has been terminated and the receiver discharged.[11]

(2) Pleading

In an action against a railroad company after the discharge of a receiver on a claim arising during the receivership, the petition must allege facts showing a liability on the part of the company.

In an action against the company after the discharge of a receiver on a claim arising during the receivership, the general rule is that the petition must allege facts showing a liability on the part of the company,[12] such as that it had assumed liability for obligations of the receiver as a condition of the return of its road to it,[13] or that liability therefor was imposed by the order or decree directing return of the property,[14] or that the receiver invested earnings in betterments or improvements.[15] However, where it is provided by statute without qualification that the company, on the return of its property without sale, shall be liable for all claims against the receiver, it is sufficient merely to allege the return of the road to the company without sale,[16] but the discharge of the receiver should be alleged,[17] and the petition should show that the receivership was not a federal one[18]

Charging liability of purchaser from receiver. Where it is attempted to hold a purchaser at a receiver's sale liable for causes of action arising during the receivership on the ground that by the terms of sale the purchaser assumed such liabilities, the terms of sale must be specifically set forth;[19] and where it attempted to hold a purchaser liable for an injury received while the road remained in the hands of the receiver after the sale and before the delivery, to the extent of betterments made by the receiver during that period, the petition must allege that the improvements were made and paid for out of earnings accruing after the sale[20]

Plea or answer. Where the company relies on the defense that the claims against it for the acts of a receiver are in excess of the value of the betterments made by him, it should be specially pleaded.[21]

(3) Evidence

In actions against a railroad company after the discharge of a receiver of the road to recover for claims arising during the receivership, the rules relating to the burden of proof and the admissibility, weight, and sufficiency of the evidence in civil actions generally apply.

Where the cause of action arose during the receivership, the burden is on plaintiff to show the appointment and discharge of the receiver and that the road was returned to defendant without sale,[22] and with permanent improvements made by the receiver from earnings accruing during the receivership,[23] or that liability for such acts was imposed by the order of the court turning back the railroad[24] or was assumed by defendant when it took back the properties.[25] However, where plaintiff shows that betterments were made by the receiver, the presumption then is that they were made out of net earnings of the road, and the burden is on defendant to show the contrary.[26]

Admissibility, weight, and sufficiency. General rules relating to the competency, relevancy, and materiality of evidence, and its weight and sufficiency, in other civil actions apply.[27]

(4) Trial, Verdict, and Judgment

The verdict and judgment should be for or against the proper parties, and where a special verdict is rendered it should find on all the essential issues of the case.

A special verdict in an action against the company on a cause of action arising during receivership must find on every issue necessary to establish the liability on the part of the company.[28] Where the action is brought against both the receiver and the company, judgment may be entered against the company alone,[29] but in the absence of a statute a judgment cannot be entered against a receiver after his discharge which will bind either the property or the railroad company.[30]

In action against purchaser of the road of an insolvent railroad company for an injury received while the road was operated by the company, it was held that, the receiver being a party to the action and having funds in his hands belonging to the insolvent company, the judgment should be against the purchaser for the full amount of the claim subject to be credited with the sum which the receiver may pay.[31] In an action against the purchaser of a railroad and its prior receivers to enforce a liability of the receivers which the purchaser agreed to pay, the verdict of the jury need not mention the purchaser, since its liability flows as a matter of law from the establishment of the claim against the receivers.[32]

§ 389. Foreign and Ancillary Receivers

a. In general
b. Ancillary receiver
c. Actions against receiver

a. In General

A court cannot extend its jurisdiction by the appointment of a receiver, but ordinarily through comity the authority of a receiver appointed in one jurisdiction will be recognized in many ways by the courts of other jurisdictions.

A court cannot extend its jurisdiction by the appointment of a receiver,[33] and the authority of a receiver as such is limited by the territorial jurisdiction of the court appointing him,[34] and any recognition accorded him beyond such limits rests entirely on comity.[35] He can do no acts by virtue of his office in another state, and therein he stands as an individual personally liable for his acts.[36] However, through comity the authority of a receiver appointed in one jurisdiction will be recognized in many ways by the courts of other jurisdictions[37] whenever to do so would not be contrary to the laws or public policy of the latter jurisdictions or prejudicial to the rights of their citizens.[38] However, such courts will not accord to a foreign receiver rights or powers to which he would not be entitled in the jurisdiction of his appointment.[39]

b. Ancillary Receiver

As a general rule, where a railroad extending through different states or jurisdictions is placed in the hands of a receiver, ancillary proceedings are instituted in the jurisdictions other than that in which the receiver was first appointed, which receiverships, through comity, are generally conducted harmoniously and with the same person appointed as receiver in the different jurisdictions.

Where a railroad extending through different states or jurisdictions is placed in the hands of a receiver, ordinarily it is highly desirable that it should be operated under a single management;[40] and, while it has been held that in such cases a court of one jurisdiction may appoint a receiver for the entire line if it has jurisdiction of the person of the corporation, and may compel the company to execute assignments of property situated in other jurisdictions to the receiver, as considered supra § 378 a, the usual practice is to institute ancillary proceedings in the jurisdictions other than that in which the receiver was first appointed.[41]

Ancillary receiverships of railroads are generally conducted in harmony with the court having original jurisdiction of the primary receivership,[42] and the courts of such jurisdictions, both through comity and in order to secure a harmonious and more profitable management, appoint the same person as receiver.[43] The court of initial proceeding and by which the receiver was first appointed is the court of primary jurisdiction,[44] and should direct and control the receiver with respect to the operation and management of the property as a whole,[45] and through comity the courts of ancillary jurisdiction should recognize and assist in carrying out its orders and directions.[46] This rule does not involve a refusal of jurisdiction or surrender of judicial independence on the part of the courts of ancillary appointment;[47] but, on the contrary, the courts of one jurisdiction cannot, and should not if they had such power, delegate or surrender to the courts of another jurisdiction the powers which the laws of their own states and justice to their own citizens require that they should retain and exercise.[48]

The courts of ancillary appointment still have power with respect to the portion of the road or property within their territorial jurisdictions to make such independent orders affecting the operation of that part of the road as the interests of the property may require or the nature of the proceedings in both courts justify[49] to hear and determine claims[50] and to pass on questions of rights of property in their jurisdictions,[51] and, where they may properly afford relief, will not require their citizens to go into the courts of other jurisdictions for the enforcement of their rights;[52] and comity requires that such acts and orders should be respected by the court of primary jurisdiction.[53]

Where all the accounts are being filed and settled and disbursements made under the direction of the court of primary jurisdiction, that court is the proper forum in which to apply for the payment of claims[54] unless the court of ancillary jurisdiction may administer, and is independently administering, the property in its jurisdiction,[55] in which event the claims should be presented there.[56]

Appointments may be merely concurrent where the same person is appointed receiver by different courts, without one being primary and the other ancillary, jurisdiction and control being alike invoked and conceded by each of the tribunals, and each being competent to enforce the observance of obligations arising under its sanction.[57]

Where original appointment void. If the action of the court of primary jurisdiction in appointing a receiver was without jurisdiction of the subject matter and void, ancillary bills for receiverships in other jurisdictions must also fall.[58]

c. Actions against Receiver

As a general rule the receiver of a railroad is not answerable in a suit in any court other than in the one appointing him.

Ordinarily the receiver of a railroad is not answerable in a suit in any court other than in the one appointing him,[59] and may not be sued in another jurisdiction[60] without leave of such court.[61]

Service of process. In an action against a receiver appointed by a federal court for a foreign railroad corporation on a cause of action arising out of a transaction had with him, service of process on an agent of the receiver within the state has been held insufficient to confer jurisdiction.[62] Where a railroad is not situated in and does no business in the state, except that an office is maintained for the purpose of soliciting passenger and freight traffic, a person employed as traffic representative is not an agent on whom service of process can be made within the meaning of a statute relating to service on receivers and trustees.[63]

cated, since it would take the very property being administered by another court.[64]

In garnishment proceedings, the fact that a receiver is a nonresident is immaterial where he is operating a road within the jurisdiction of the court issuing the garnishee process and where the sum due to the judgment debtor is payable,[65] unless the effect of the judgment would be to disturb the possession of the property or some specific fund placed in the hands of the receiver by the appointing court, and where such property or fund was claimed by different creditors and claimants,[66] or where the receiver was appointed, not to continue the business, but merely to sell the property and apply the proceeds under order of the court.[67]

XII. OPERATION AND REGULATION THEREOF IN GENERAL

A. DUTY TO OPERATE AND FURNISH FACILITIES

§ 390. In General

A railroad retaining its franchise must operate its lines so as adequately to meet all reasonable public requirements, in the manner and for the purposes contemplated by its charter, and it is under a duty to furnish all equipment and facilities essential to such operation.

As a general rule, a railroad retaining its franchise must operate its lines,[68] so as adequately to meet all reasonable public requirements,[69] in the manner and for the purposes contemplated by its charter,[70] and impartially without discrimination for or against persons demanding similar services.[71] So it is the duty of a railroad to serve on reasonable terms all those who desire the service it renders,[72] and it may not choose to serve only those portions of the territory which it finds most profitable, leaving the remainder to get along without the service which it alone can give.[73]

The duty of operation exists apart from statute,[74] and arises from acceptance of the franchises, rights, and privileges granted by the state.[75] However, in the absence of contract, charter, constitution or statute providing otherwise, the duty of a railroad company as to operating its road is no greater than the public interests demand and justify,[76] and it is not obliged to waste materials and money on a service which serves no useful purpose.[77] A car-

Service commensurate with needs

Where a railroad has a franchise from the state to engage in general railroad business within the state, it is a "common carrier" and owes to communities through which it operates its line a duty to furnish service commensurate with needs of communities.—Lowden v. State, 78 P.2d 1059, 182 Okl. 549

Predominant interests

The interests of the public and the duty of a carrier by rail to continue to provide transportation have precedence over the interests of creditors, lessors, bondholders, and stockholders, and the right of the public is preferred to the property rights of all other persons.—Farmers Grain Co. v Toledo, P. & W. "Convenience" and "necessity"

Anything which tends to cripple seriously or destroy an established system of transportation that is necessary to a community is not a "convenience" and "necessity" for the public.—Application of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 295 N.W. 389, 138 Neb. 767

rier's operation under a charter authorizing the construction of lines through a particular district has been held to create no implied agreement by the carrier to serve the district.[78] Ordinarily, no one has the right to interfere with the operation of railroad trains on schedule while engaged in the performance of their functions as common carriers of freight and passengers.[79]

In connection with the operation of its lines, a railroad is under a duty to furnish all equipment and facilities essential to performance of its duties.[80] Unless otherwise provided by statute, it need not, however, furnish facilities convenient to the public but not essential to transportation.[81] The term "adequate or reasonable facilities" with respect to the service required to be rendered by railroads calls for such facilities as may be fairly demanded with regard to the size of the place served, the extent of the demand for transportation, the cost of furnishing additional accommodations, and to all other facts which would have a bearing on the questions of convenience and cost;[82] the term does not mean that the same facilities must be provided at every point, regardless of public patronage or the incidental cost of the facilities,[83] and the circumstances of the business of a railroad in each particular community govern the nature of the service and facilities required to be furnished by the railroad.[84] A railroad is under no duty to provide facilities for possible future business which may never materialize.[85]

The duties of a railroad with respect to service and facilities have been classified as absolute and for additional convenience only, and it has been held with respect to such classification that in the performance of an absolute duty, the question of expense is not to be considered, but that where the duty sought to be enforced is one of additional convenience rather than necessity, the question of expense to the company and relative benefit to the public is the deciding factor and may not be disregarded.[86] It has been held, however, that while the division of duties into these two classes is useful in analyzing a given situation, it does not have any controlling significance,[87] and that it is subordinate to the rule that the railroad must furnish facilities and services which are adequate and reasonable.[88]

Duty to reduce expenses

In view of curtailment of business previously done by railroad companies, and in view of large amount of railroad mileage in bankruptcy, railroad companies are not only justified in reducing their expenses, where it is practicable to do so with reasonable regard to efficiency and without impairment of their absolute obligations, but it is their duty to do so in the public interest—Southern Ry Co. v Public Service Commission, 10 S.E.2d 769, 195 S.C. 247.

Rights of railroad and the public must be considered in determining in any particular case what constitutes "adequate, efficient, just and reasonable service", since a particular service by a railroad may be reasonable in a small noncommercial community which would be wholly inadequate and inefficient in a commercial or manufacturing community.—Application of Union Pac. § 391. Relief from Performance of Duty

A railroad is not relieved from its paramount duty to furnish facilities essential to transportation by the fact that performance will involve pecuniary loss, and a railroad cannot by contract relieve itself of its public duty to operate.

A railroad is not relieved from its paramount duty to furnish facilities essential to transportation by the fact that performance will involve pecuniary loss.[89] So, if a railroad is solvent and prosperous, it cannot escape performance of its duty of furnishing transportation over one portion of its road by showing that such portion does not pay, when all parts of the system are so interwoven that an accurate ascertainment of the profits of any one portion of the road is impracticable.[90] It has been held, however, that a railroad company has the duty to seek, and regulatory agencies have the duty to permit, elimination of those services and facilities which are no longer needed or used by the public to any substantial extent.[91] While a railroad cannot be forced to operate in the face of unlawful conduct and acts of violence on the part of striking employees, especially where such conduct approaches the magnitude of civil war,[92] it may be compelled to resume its duties as a common carrier of freight and passengers which it has virtually suspended owing to a controversy with its employees as to the rate of wages where no sufficient excuse is shown for not providing other employees sufficient to do the work.[93]

A railroad cannot by contract relieve itself of its public duty to operate.[94]

§ 392. Abandonment or Discontinuance

a. As to whole road
b. As to part of road
c. Consent of state
d. Proceedings to discontinue operation

a. As to Whole Road

A railroad intending to give up its franchise may, in the absence of a contract or statute providing otherwise, abandon operation of its entire road if it can be operated only at a loss and there is no reasonable prospect of future profitable operation.

While under a statute which is merely permissive a railroad company cannot be compelled to construct its railroad, as discussed supra § 121, a railroad intending to give up its franchise may, in the absence of a controlling contract or statute providing otherwise,[95] abandon operation of its entire road if it can be operated only at a loss and there is no reasonable prospect of future profitable operation.[96] To deny the road the right of abandonment under such circumstances would be to deprive it of its property without due process of law in violation of constitutional provisions.[97] The rule that a railroad continuing to exercise its charter privileges must provide reasonably safe, and adequate facilities even if this involves pecuniary loss, as discussed supra § 391, does not militate against the principle that the company may abandon its road entirely.[98] The fact that striking employees were unlawfully interfering with the operation of a railroad, and that connecting lines had unlawfully refused to interchange traffic with the railroad, has been held not to show that the railroad had been abandoned[99]

Contract. No contract to continue operation of a road at a loss will be implied from acceptance of a charter[1] or permission to exercise the power of eminent domain.[2]

Subsequent statute. The right of abandonment has been held not impaired by subsequent legislation.[3]

b. As to Part of Road

Where the road as a whole is profitable, the company may be obligated to operate the whole, including an unprofitable portion if bound to do so by charter or statutory provisions or under the terms of a land grant; but in the absence of such positive duty, whether it will be obligated to continue the operation of an unprofitable portion depends on the circumstances of the particular case.

Where the road as a whole is profitable, the company may be obligated to operate the whole, including an unprofitable portion if bound to do so by charter[4] or statutory[5] provisions or under the terms of a land grant.[6] In the absence of such positive duty, however, whether it will be obligated to continue the operation of an unprofitable portion depends on the circumstances of the case;[7] thus, where public requirements demand continued operation of an unprofitable line, the road may be under a duty to operate despite a loss sustained as to such line;[8] but, on the other hand, where the loss to the road outweighs any public benefit, there is no duty to continue operation of an unprofitable portion,[9] as where there is a duplication of facilities,[10] or where continued operation of the unprofitable portion would be at a loss so great as to endanger the financial welfare of the whole.[11]

In the absence of a contract between a property owner and the railroad, or a statute forbidding the removal of a line of the railroad, there is no right in any such property owner in an area served by the line of the railroad to require its continued maintenance and operation.[12] Moreover, it has been held that a person contracting with a railroad must contemplate that when public necessity and convenience require abandonment of a particular part of its line, the railroad may not be bound by a provision of the contract to operate that line in perpetuity.[13]

Resumption of service. A railroad is under no duty to resume operation of an abandoned line where the expense to the road is disproportionate to the prospective public benefit[14] or where it has been abandoned for so long a time that the right to operate it has been lost.[15]

c. Consent of State

While a railroad may not be permitted to abandon operation of a portion of its road without consent of the state, a railroad whose whole line is operated at a loss has the right, in the absence of statutory, or charter, or contractual provision to the contrary, to stop operations without consent by the state.

While a railroad may not be permitted to abandon operation of a portion of its road without consent of the state,[16] a railroad whose whole line is operated at a loss has the right, in the absence of statutory or charter or contractual provision to the contrary, to stop operations without consent of the state.[17]

Under statutes permitting abandonment on express authorization, the railroad cannot abandon a line in the absence of the prescribed authorization,[18] which will not be implied from a certificate authorizing an extension duplicating service.[19]

Destruction. Railroads cannot be destroyed without the consent of the state.[20]

d. Proceedings to Discontinue Operation

Boards or commissions sometimes have jurisdiction to allow a railroad company to abandon, or to prevent it from abandoning its road or a portion thereof, but the enforcement of their orders by the court will depend on whether they are equitable and just.

In some jurisdictions boards or commissions have jurisdiction to allow a railroad company to abandon,[21] or to prevent it from abandoning,[22] its road or a portion thereof, but the enforcement of their orders by the court will depend on whether under the circumstances they are equitable and just.[23] In determining whether a company should be permitted to abandon a portion of its road, the commission should consider the ability of the road from its earnings to meet operating expenses.[24] Under some provisions, the commission may authorize abandonment of a line only when it is shown that the abandonment will not result in substantial injury to the public, and it is without power to act solely on the ground that the line proposed to be abandoned can be operated only at a loss.[25]

Necessary parties to a proceeding for discontinuance or abandonment of a railroad include the proper representatives of the public interest,[26] and the railroad.[27] Railroad patrons affected by the proposed abandonment of the line may be heard in the proceeding.[28]

Pleading. Under statutes expressly providing for initiation of proceedings before a commission to compel establishment of facilities at stations by petition, and containing no express provision for petition to discontinue existing facilities, the filing of a petition is not essential to its jurisdiction to discontinue such facilities.[29]

Review by courts. The determination of the commission with respect to an application for abandonment or discontinuance of a railroad line is subject

Notice to counsel
In proceeding for grant of permission to railroad to abandon service and facilities on a branch line, where counsel for objecting railroad patron did not enter appearance, the commission could not be expected to notify counsel and was not responsible for patron's failure to give counsel notice of hearing, until day before the date fixed.—Crown Products Co. v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, supra.

to review in the courts.[30] The findings of the commission will be considered by the court as prima facie evidence of the facts,[31] and the order of the commission will be regarded by the court as prima facie reasonable,[32] and the court ordinarily will not substitute its judgment for that of the commission.[33]

Authorization by court of equity With respect to the rights of a mortgagee of railroad property, a court of equity may authorize the abandonment of portions of the railway system covered by the mortgage, where it appears that such portions constitute a small part of the entire system and have been and will be operated at a substantial loss which cannot be prevented by any other course.[34]

B. REGULATION IN GENERAL

§ 393. By Railroad Company

Every railroad has broad discretionary powers relative to operation; but such discretion is not absolute and it must be exercised with due regard for the public welfare, and is subject to governmental control and regulation.

As a general rule every railroad has broad discretionary powers relative to operation,[35] and the owners of a railroad will not be interfered with in the management of their property if there is no competent evidence of any patron being deprived of reasonable facilities.[36] However, the railroad's discretion is not absolute,[37] it must be exercised with due regard for public welfare,[38] and is subject to governmental control and regulation.[39] So it has been held that the duty of a railroad to the public is regulated by law, and not by rules promulgated by the railroad itself applicable to its personnel.[40] A railroad company in the process of reorganization under the Bankruptcy Act and operating with a trustee, and whose increased business is due to a war still in progress, is under an obligation to the public generally to effect all reasonable economies so long as reasonably adequate and satisfactory service is still rendered.[41]

§ 394. Public Regulation

All services of a public nature performed by a railroad are subject to duly authorized and properly exercised governmental regulation.

As a general rule, all services of a public nature performed by a railroad are subject to duly authorized and properly exercised governmental regulation, in order to correct abuses and to prevent unjust discrimination.[42] The regulation of railroad traffic falls within the police power.[43]

Pleadings

In suit by railroad against public service commission for review of commission's order denying railroad's request for leave to discontinue two passenger trains operating daily between two communities, refusal to allow railroad to amend bill of complaint and to present evidence to show that if permission should be granted to discontinue the two trains, railroad would make arrangements to put on additional passenger bus to operate between the two communities making connections with railroad's interstate streamliner, rested in sound discretion of trial court—Chicago & N. W Ry. Co v. Michigan Public Service Commission, 45 N W.2d 520, 329 Mich. 432.

Admissibility of evidence

On appeal from order of commission granting suburban railroad leave to abandon and close for traffic a part of right of way, refusing to permit villages affected to offer evidence before introduction of record before commission, or unless they offered all testimony taken before commission, held error.—Minneapolis & St. P. § 395. —— By State or Municipaliy

a. By state
b. By municipality

a. By State

The state may regulate and control the operation of railroads, and the furnishing of facilities by them, subject to the requirement that it act reasonably, and not arbitrarily, and it may exercise this power directly, or degelate it to municipalities or to a board or commission.

Under its general police power and the reserved power to amend, alter, or repeal railroad charters, the state may regulate and control the operation of railroads,[44] and the furnishing of facilities by them[45] This power may be exercised either directly,[46] or through a municipality, as discussed infra subdivision b of this section, or a board or commission, infra § 396, since the state may, within constitutional limitations, delegate its power of regulation to municipalities[47] or to a board or commission;[48] but a regulative power which in its varying local applications would render the functioning of the railroad under its state charter impracticable cannot be delegated.[49]

It has been said that the power of a state to regulate operation of railroads is inherent[50] Obligations placed on a railroad by a statute requiring the railroad to be equipped with ample accommodations for all passenger travel and freight transportation are for the benefit of the public, and no individual or community enjoys any special interest or contractual right exclusive of, or paramount to, that of the state.[51] Where a statute dealing with a railroad refers to "public convenience and necessity," it does not mean one or more persons that may be benefited at a particular locality but it means the public generally, and in determining the true public convenience the effect of the order on the whole public instead of a small part of the public should be taken into consideration.[52]

Extent and limits of power. The right to regulate operation of a railroad extends to matters affecting the public convenience as well as the public safety.[53] The state must exercise its power of regulation reasonably and not arbitrarily,[54] and within constitutional limitations[55] Loss to the railroad will be considered in determining the reasonableness of a regulation,[56] but is not necessarily conclusive as to unreasonableness.[57] There is authority to the effect that a railroad operating under a permissive, as distinguished from a mandatory, charter or franchise cannot be compelled to continue operation at a loss.[58] It is within the state's police power to require a permit from a board or commission as prerequisite to abandonment of service over a railroad line.[59]

Surrender of power. In the absence of positive language to that effect, statutory or constitutional provisions reserving rights to railroads will not be construed as a surrender of the state's power to regulate operation.[60]

b. By Municipality

The operation of a railroad within its municipal boundaries may be a proper subject of regulation by a municipal corporation, but the power must be exercised within its scope, without conflicting with statutory provisions, and the regulation must be reasonable.

The operation of a railroad within its municipal boundaries may be a proper subject of regulation by a municipal corporation [61] While the power to enact certain regulations with respect to railroads has been referred to as an inherent power,[62] and many such regulations have been sustained as valid without express legislative authority for their enactment under the general police powers usually conferred on or possessed by such bodies,[63] generally the power must be expressly granted or arise by necessary implication.[64] The regulation must be reasonable,[65] at least in its application to the particular case.[66]

The power must be exercised within its scope,[67] without conflicting with statutory provisions,[68] and without unreasonably invading private rights [69] The regulation must not be arbitrary[70] or discriminatory.[71] It must be certain and definite,[72] but it may be enforced if sufficiently definite and certain in its terms to inform the railroad company what it is required to do.[73] It has been held that in the operation of its road and in the running of its cars the judgment of the board of directors of a railroad company, in the absence of statutory provisions, is supreme and exclusive,[74] and that a municipal corporation has no power to interfere therewith.[75]

Surrender of power. A municipality does not surrender its power of regulation because of a grant to use its streets for railroad purposes.[76]

Property used for profit
A statutory provision authorizing the commission to direct additions, extensions, repairs, improvements, and changes in the facilities of public utilities after hearing and a finding that such additions, etc., are necessary is broad enough to impose a duty on a railroad to maintain property which it uses for profit as well as that which it owns and gives commission authority to enforce duty.—Alton R. Co v. Illinois Commerce Commission ex rel. Moulding-Brownell Corp., 15 N.E 2d 508, 368 Ill 584, affirmed Alton R. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 59 S.Ct. 340, 305 U.S. 548, 83 L Ed. 344.

under a statute cannot be valid unless the statute itself is valid.[78] The board or commission may ordinarily exercise some, without exercising all, of its delegated powers.[79] The obligations of a railroad to maintain transportation reasonably adequate to meet the public convenience and necessity should ultimately be measured by the terms of the constitutional provision giving the commission the power and duty of supervising, regulating, and controlling railroads, rather than by the railroad's charter.[80]

Judicial review. The actions of a board or commission in regulating the operation of railroads generally are subject to review in the courts.[81] Under some statutes, an appeal may be taken only from a final order.[82]

b. Extent and Limits of Power

The extent and limits of the delegated power of a board or commission are measured by the instrument of delegation, and by the requirement that its acts be reasonable. The reasonableness of an order will depend on the particular facts involved.

The extent and limits of the delegated power of a board or commission are measured by the instrument of delegation, within constitutional limitations.[83] Under a statute delegating to a commission the power to compel a railroad to furnish reasonably adequate service, equipment and facilities, the commission may have power to order the furnishing of new facilities.[84] Under a statute empowering a board or commission to require a railroad to conform to state laws and to the commission's lawful regulations, and to prevent discontinuance of facilities without prior permission, the board or commission may require a railroad to establish[85] and maintain[86] such suitable facilities and conveniences as may be just and reasonable. However, under a statute requiring the commission to recommend steps to be taken to prevent railroad accidents, and to make the recommendations public unless the railroad shall carry them out within a reasonable time, the commission is not authorized to require railroads to adopt safety measures.[87]

The power of a board or commission to regulate the operation of railroads is subject to the limitation that its orders or regulations be reasonable.[88] In this respect, the reasonableness of an order will depend on the particular facts involved.[89] In determining whether a regulation governing the operation

Order held not unreasonable

Commission's order dismissing railroad's application for permission to maintain bridge constructed without permission of commission and with less horizontal clearance than required by commission held not unreasonable, under evidence showing that failure to construct proper bridge was due principally to neglect in planning, and that, although construction of bridge with proper clearance would have been more expensive and expedient, it would not have been impractical or have required prohibitive expense.—State ex rel. St. Paul & Kansas City Short Line R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 98 S.W.2d 699, 339 Mo. 641.

of a railroad is reasonable, the matter of expense is important criteria to be considered,[90] and where the inquiry concerns the reasonableness of an order of the commission to compel a railroad to furnish a facility not included within its absolute duties, the court must consider all the facts, such as the places and persons interested, the volume of business to be affected, and the saving in time and expense to the shipper as against the cost and loss to the railroad.[91] The facilities required of a railroad by the commission must be consistent with and restrained by economy of operation within the realm of business-like principles of income and expenditures.[92]

Power to regulate operation and facilities cannot be used merely for the purpose of creating traffic.[93] A state commission is without power to prevent the operation of a purely interstate route, where the railroad obeys all rules and regulations of the commission, the terms and conditions of the interstate certificate, and all state laws and municipal ordinances.[94] A judicial question is beyond the jurisdiction of an administrative board or commission.[95] The commission may have jurisdiction to establish rules governing the traffic relations between two intersecting railroads.[96]

The order of the commission regulating the operation of a railroad must be sufficiently explicit to inform the railroad what conduct on its part will render it liable to penalties, and an order which is so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application lacks that certainty essential to validity.[97] Severable requirements of a single order of the commission will be treated as separate orders, if one is invalid as unreasonable or unjust.[98]

Abandonment of road. Under statutes empowering a board or commission to permit abandonment of a railroad line under specified conditions, it lacks the power to authorize abandonment in the absence of such condition,[99] or on a ground not specified in the enabling statute.[1]

Resumption of service. Under statutes empowering a commission finding any element of a railroad's service inadequate and reasonably possible to be furnished, to order the road to do so, the commission has power to direct a railroad to resume traffic over an abandoned portion of its line,[2] with respect to both passenger[3] and freight[4] service. Ordinarily a board or commission lacks power to compel resumption of operation of a line of railroad abandoned prior to enactment of the statute creating the board or commission.[5]

Specification as to time. Under statutes giving a board or commission power to determine a railroad's duty with respect to operation and to enforce performance under penalty, the board or commission has implied power to fix the time within which the duty must be performed.[6]

Health measures. Under statutes enumerating specific health measures which a board or commission may order with respect to railroad operation, it lacks power to order an unspecified health measure.[7]

§ 397. —— By Courts

In the absence of a statutory grant of authority, the courts have no power to prescribe regulations affecting the operation of railroads.

The rule that, in the absence of a statutory grant of authority, the courts have no power to prescribe regulations for the control of railroads, discussed supra § 28, applies to regulations affecting operation.[8] A fortiori a court order for additional operating facilities is unwarranted where the road as operated is unable to pay expenses,[9] or where it is not shown that the facilities furnished are not reasonably adequate and the increase demanded would impose an undue hardship on the company.[10] Where by statutory or constitutional provisions the power to prescribe operating regulations is vested in a board or commission, the power of the court is limited to review of the latter's orders[11]

§ 398. —— Companies, Roads, Persons, and Operations Subject to Regulation

a. In general
b. Companies organized under special charters
c. Effect of time of incorporation or construction
d. Ownership of line

a. In General

In the absence of any provision to the contrary in the statute imposing the regulation or in the charter of the company, statutory regulations with respect to railroads apply to all companies doing business within the jurisdiction imposing the regulation, whether chartered or unchartered.

In the absence of any provision to the contrary in the statute imposing the regulation or in the charter of the company, statutory regulations with respect to railroads apply to all companies doing business within the jurisdiction imposing the regulation,[12] whether chartered or unchartered,[13] and without regard to the time of their incorporation or construction or whether incorporated under general laws or special charters, as discussed infra subdivisions b and c of this section. A statute in terms applicable to railroads of over a certain length applies to a road of over that length, although not all of the prescribed length is within the state imposing the regulation.[14]

Receiver. Regulatory statutes have been held applicable to railroads run by receivers.[15]

What constitutes a "railroad" Within the application of the statutes regulating operation the term "railroad" applies to "dummy" lines,[16] "belt" lines maintained by connecting roads for the purpose of transferring freight,[17] lateral railroads,[18] and to roads using electricity as a motive power as well as steam railroads,[19] except where the statute is not reasonably applicable to electric roads.[20]

What constitutes "operation." A company will be held to be "operating" a railroad within the application of the statutes if running trains thereon for any purpose,[21] including the operation of trains for construction purposes on incompleted portions[22]

Where statutes relative to abandonment of a road are phrased in broad and general language, they will be construed as applicable to all forms of railroad service[23]

Common carrier or private line. Some regulatory statutes have been held applicable only to railroads doing business as common carriers.[24] Accordingly, regulatory statutes have been held inapplicable to private lines on private property used by the proprietors exclusively for their private purposes,[25] such as private logging roads,[26] although there is authority to the contrary.[27]

b. Companies Organized under Special Charters

Statutory regulations with respect to railroad companies apply to those incorporated under special charters as well as under general laws, unless the statute imposing the regulations shows a contrary intention.

Statutory regulations with respect to railroad companies apply to those incorporated under special charters as well as under general laws,[28] unless the statute imposing the regulation shows an intention, to the contrary, either expressly,[29] or by implication from the character of its provisions,[30] or there is some provision in the charter which prevents its application.[31] The mere fact that the charter makes provision as to certain duties and how they shall be performed does not affect the right of the state in the exercise of its police power to impose other and further regulations in respect of the same duties,[32] or affect the application of existing general statutes not inconsistent with the provisions of the charter.[33]

c. Effect of Time of Incorporation or Construction

General statutory regulations affecting the operation of railroads are ordinarily applicable to those incorporated or constructed before as well as after the passage of the act, unless the statute provides otherwise.

General statutory regulations affecting the operation of railroads are ordinarily applicable to those incorporated or constructed before as well as after the passage of the act,[34] unless the statute provides otherwise.[35] This rule applies in all cases where the regulation is a proper exercise of the police power,[36] or the right to alter or amend the charter is reserved.[37] Conversely, a statute in terms relating to "all existing railroad corporations" extends to companies incorporated after as well as before its passage unless exception is provided in their charters.[38]

d. Ownership of Line

Regulatory statutes have been held applicable to lines operated by a railroad irrespective of whether the company owns the land on which its road is built or has merely a right of way over it.

Regulatory statutes have been held applicable to lines operated by a railroad irrespective of whether the company owns the land on which its road is built or has merely a right of way over it.[39] It has been said that a company operating a road will be deemed the owner thereof within the application of the statutes.[40] However, a railroad having neither ownership nor lease of a particular line cannot be compelled to acquire and operate it,[41] nor will the lessee of a railroad company under a lease which all parties admit to be void be compelled to operate the road.[42]

§ 399. —— Construction of Statutes

a. In general
b. Penal provisions

a. In General

Statutes regulating the operation of a railroad should be construed so as to effectuate the reasonable intention of the legislature. In the case of successive statutes imposing different or additional regulations, the latter will not be construed as impliedly repealing or superseding the former unless the provisions are so inconsistent that they cannot stand together.

Statutes regulating the operation of a railroad should be construed so as to effectuate the reasonable intention of the legislature.[43] Regulatory statutes will in general be given a liberal construction to carry out their purpose.[44] Regulatory statutes of an ambiguous character will ordinarily be construed so as to be valid rather than invalid.[45] Under a statute providing in one section that, if a commission shall find it necessary to the rendering of sufficient service, it may, after hearing, make an order requiring a railroad to furnish facilities, and in another section that, under specified conditions, the commission may compel a road to furnish private switch connections, the first section should be construed as referring to public and not to private facilities.[46]

Repeal by implication. In the case of successive statutes imposing different or additional regulations, the latter will not be construed as impliedly repealing or entirely superseding the former unless the provisions are so inconsistent that they cannot stand together.[47]

b. Penal Provisions

Regulatory statutes imposing penalties are subject to the rule of strict construction, and they will not be extended by implication to cases not clearly within their application; but such a statute should not be construed so strictly as to defeat its obvious purpose.

Regulatory statutes imposing penalties are subject to the usual rule of strict construction.[48] They will not be extended by implication to cases not clearly within their application,[49] or so as to impose a cumulative penalty for successive violations, as discussed infra § 444, or a liability on,[50] or a right of recovery by or for the use of,[51] persons not clearly within the application of the statute; and where the penal clause of a statute is less comprehensive than the body of the statute, the liability for the penalty will be restricted to the matters and persons specified in the penal clause.[52]

The rule of strict construction is not, however, violated by the court taking a common sense view of the statute as a whole and adopting the sense of the words which best harmonizes with the clear intent and object of the legislature;[53] and the statute should not be construed so strictly as to defeat its obvious purpose.[54] Courts cannot read into a penal statute any language excusing offenders any more than they can read into it language increasing liability.[55]

Criminal statute construction. In a civil action to recover a penalty, the safety appliance acts are not to be construed by the rules which govern the construction of criminal statutes.[56]

C. PARTICULAR REGULATIONS AND DUTIES

§ 400. Railroad Employees

The state may adopt reasonable regulations affecting railroad employees, and a regulatory commission may be granted plenary power to promulgate and enforce orders relating to the protection, welfare, and safety of such employees.

The general power of the state to regulate the operation of railroads extends to the adoption of reasonable regulations affecting railroad employees,[57] and a regulatory commission may be granted plenary power to promulgate and enforce orders relating to the protection, welfare, and safety of such employees.[58] So a commission may

"Police power"
Commission has power under "police power" delegated to it by the general assembly to make reasonable regulations protecting health, safety and welfare of those engaged in railroad's switching business, so long as such regulations do not constitute an attempt to regulate, or do not directly burden interstate commerce, or run counter to federal regulations on the subject.—Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Terminal Railroad Ass'n of St. Louis, 41 N.E.2d 481, 379 Ill. 403, affirmed Terminal R. Ass'n of St. Louis v. Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Ill., 63 S.Ct. 420, 318 U.S. 1, 87 L.Ed. 571.

have power to order a railroad to desist from the practice of permitting a yardmaster to act as a member of the crew of trains operating within the yard,[59] or of permitting the yardmaster to depart from his supervisory and administrative duties in order to operate signals to govern the switching of cars;[60] and where the evidence is in conflict, the court reviewing the order of the commission will not substitute its judgment for that of the commission by holding erroneous the order of the commission.[61]

Qualifications. Regulations imposing reasonable tests of capacity and restricting employment to those able to pass such tests are valid,[62] but regulations imposing arbitrary tests as to qualification are invalid.[63] A statute requiring railroad employees to pass a physical examination for defects of vision is reasonable and valid,[64] and has been held applicable to employment of persons within the state under contracts made outside the state.[65] It has also been held that a doctor appointed under such statute to examine applicants is under a mandatory duty to do so.[66]

Transportation for employees. Statutes have been held valid which authorize the commission to require railroad companies to provide necessary transportation for employees engaged in the operation of trains in getting to outlying terminals.[67] The commission may, however, act only within the scope of the powers conferred and under the conditions specified by the statute,[68] and its order must not be arbitrary or discriminatory.[69]

Uniforms, caps, and badges. Under a statute so providing, railroads may be required to provide uniform caps for certain employees, without charge.[70] Such a statute has been held valid,[71] notwithstanding a similar duty is not imposed on transportation companies other than railroads;[72] but it has also been held that a statute requiring railroads to provide uniforms, hats, and distinguishing badges to be worn by certain employees is invalid.[73]

Weather sheds. Under a statute requiring railroads to provide weather sheds where construction and repair work is permanently done, at all division points, for use of employees permanently engaged in such work, the terminus of a small branch line has been held not a division point;[74] and "permanently" means "constantly" as applied to the

"Necessary"
Under the statute providing that the commission may when "necessary," require railroads to provide necessary transportation for employees, quoted word means a general necessity for transportation of all operating employees during all working hours to conduct railroad operations for convenience of general public, and not for personal convenience of some of employees for part of the time.—Wabash R. § 401. —— Full Crew Regulations

a In general
b. Construction and operation

a. In General

The so-called "full crew" statutes requiring a specified number and kind of employees on certain trains or cars are valid and enforceable, if sufficiently reasonable and definite, and a regulatory commission may promulgate reasonable requirements as to the number and kind of crew members under its power to adopt regulations relating to the protection, welfare, and safety of railroad employees and the public.

Under the so-called "full crew" statutes a specified number and kind of employees may be required on certain trains or cars.[77] These statutes are designed to promote the safety of passengers and employees,[78] and, when they do not otherwise infringe constitutional provisions, are valid and enforceable,[79] if sufficiently reasonable[80] and definite.[81] Likewise, a commission may promulgate reasonable requirements as to the number of crew members under its power to adopt regulations relating to the protection, welfare, and safety of railroad employees and the public,[82] provided it acts within the scope of its powers;[83] but, where a statute fixes the necessary members of a train crew, the commission may be without authority to require additional crew members.[84] Ordinarily a commission has no authority, by rule or otherwise, to relieve a railroad corporation from penalties that it would otherwise incur under a "full crew" statute; nor may it make those penalties applicable to situations which do not fall within the statute[85]

In some jurisdictions municipalities have the power to determine the number or qualifications

Particular employee or class
Full train crew law is designed to promote safety of passengers and employees of railroad, and is not primarily in interests of any particular employee or class of employees.—Beal v. Missouri Pac. R. Presumption
The purpose of the full-crew law is to protect safety of employees and passengers on railroads, and presumptively at least the legislature, in enacting the law, was thinking about dangers incident to railroad operations in state and not in adjoining states.—Union Pac. R. Co. v. Anderson, 120 P.2d 578, 167 Or. 687.

Unreasonable financial burden
Where compliance with both regulatory statute and rule of a railroad governing operation of its maintenance of way crews causes duplication of effort on part of employees which results in unreasonable financial burden on railroad, court will not for that reason declare statute unconstitutional and void.—Northern Pac. (1) Order of commission requiring an additional flagman on passenger trains of five cars or more on a railroad protected by automatic signals was unreasonable, since a train of less than five cars requires equal flag protection.—Chicago Great Western Ry. b. Construction and Operation

(3) Nature and composition of car or train
(4) Train and switching movements
(5) Character and location of crew

(1) In General

Provisions of the "full crew" statutes, being penal, are subject to the rule of strict construction, but they should not be interpreted so as to defeat the obvious purpose of the legislature. Such statutes are applicable only to cases within their terms.

The provisions of the "full crew" statutes, being penal, are subject to the usual rule of strict construction,[88] but they should not be interpreted so as to defeat the obvious purpose of the legislature.[89] Such statutes may by their terms be limited in their operation to certain railroads or lines, to trains or cars of a certain nature or composition, and to certain train movements or operations, as discussed infra subdivisions b (2)–(4) of this section, and, hence, they are applicable only to cases within their terms,[90] but where they apply, the running of a train with less than the prescribed number of employees constitutes a violation.[91]

(2) Railroads or Railroad Lines within Regulations

"Full crew" statutes have been construed to apply to common carriers only, and not to private railroads not doing business as common carriers. A single track branch, irrespective of its length, is a railroad to which such a statute is applicable.

"Full crew" statutes have been construed to apply to common carriers only, and not to private railroads not doing business as common carriers.[92] Under a statute requiring a specified crew on certain trains operated over a road or part of it, a single track branch is a railroad irrespective of its length,[93] or the fact that it is used exclusively for freight,[94] and despite the existence of numerous private sidings along the line.[95]

Under a statute applicable to railroads operating lines of over a specified number of miles, ownership alone is not the only test of whether the railroad is a short independent line not within the statute or part of the overall system of a trunk line within the statute, but the issue is whether the railroad company operates the line as a part of its system.[96] While a statute requiring a specified crew

Where railroad operated trunk line not less than one hundred miles in length and also branch line about twenty-eight miles long over tracks leased from another road, on which switching operations were conducted across streets of city of first class, although branch equipment and train crew were used only on branch line for which separate books were kept, branch could not be deemed a "railroad less than one hundred miles in on trains operated on a road over a certain number of miles in length is not designed to be extraterritorial in effect,[97] it does apply to a road if its total line within and outside the state exceeds the specified distance.[98] A full-crew statute in terms applicable to trains "sent out" on a railroad within the state has been construed as applicable to trains starting from a different state and passing through the local state to points beyond the borders of the latter[99]

Number of trains. Under a statutory provision excepting from the full crew requirement "any line of railroad in this state on which but one train a day is operated each way," the roads excepted are those with traffic limited exclusively to one daily train each way.[1]

(3) Nature and Composition of Car or Train

Under the terms of the "full crew" statutes, the number of the crew required may depend on the kind of car or train which is being operated, and the requirements of such statutes do not apply to trains composed of less than the specified number of cars.

Under the terms of the "full crew" statutes, the number of the crew required may depend on the kind of car or train which is being operated.[2] Under statutes prescribing different and specified crews for freight, passenger, or "other" trains, and failing to define the specified classes of trains, it will be presumed that the legislature used the terms in their ordinary or popular signification,[3] and a freight train will be defined as one carrying freight only,[4] a passenger train one carrying passengers and no freight,[5] and mixed trains will fall within the category of "other" trains.[6] Under statutes requiring specified crews for passenger trains and for freight trains, a mixed passenger and freight train is not covered.[7] A statute relative to employees on trains transporting passengers and merchandise is inapplicable to trains carrying passengers only.[8] A statute applicable to a locomotive handling "cars" does not apply to a locomotive moving an auxiliary tender.[9]

The requirements of a "full crew" statute directed to trains of more than a certain number of cars do not apply to trains composed of less than the specified number of cars.[10] Under a statute requiring any train, carrying passengers, consisting of a certain number of passenger coaches and one baggage car, to carry a specified crew, a combination car in fact used for baggage is a "baggage car" notwithstanding the absence of a baggageman[11] or the locking of the aforesaid car.[12] Un-

The term "train," as used in full-crew law in describing the crews required for different kinds of trains named in the statute, means a series of cars drawn by a locomotive engine over the tracks of the railroad, and it indicates a transportation agency, one of the principal purposes of which is mobility of action over and on the tracks of the railroad.—Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co. v State, Tex Civ App., 131 S.W.2d 702, error refused.

"Construction train"

A wrecking crane, used in repairing track, which was operated by steam power and was mounted on flat car with the engine geared to the truck wheels so as to enable it to move slowly over the track, together with flat car on which crane rested while being transported to and from work zone, a water car, and coal car loaded with heavy stone for riprap purposes on right of way, did not constitute a "construction train" within full-crew law.—Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co v. State, supra.

Power as standard

Under statute stating what self-propelled vehicles not used for transportation of passengers and freight or property for hire shall be manned by a full crew, the legislature made "sufficient power to draw or propel itself and one or more standard railroad cars" the standard for determining to which self-propelled vehicles operating on or over railroad tracks the statute applies, and in view of the relationship of power to size and weight, the standard is reasonable.—Northern Pac. der a statute requiring two brakemen on passenger trains carrying four or more passenger coaches or cars, a train of less than four passenger cars but of more than four cars is not within the requirement.[13] Pullman sleepers are passenger coaches within the meaning of the statute relative to full-crew requirements of passenger trains[14]

The term "passenger train" within a "full crew" statute has been held to refer only to a steam-operated train,[15] so that the statute is inapplicable to modern gasoline, electric, and gasoline-electric motor cars or trains, carrying passengers over steam railroads.[16] So a statute in terms applicable to passenger trains of five cars or less has been held inapplicable to motor cars where the legislature recognized a railway motor car as one classification of trains.[17] The fact, however, that a particular type of engine or machine came into existence after the enactment of the statute stating what self-propelled vehicle shall be manned by a full crew, does not preclude the statute from applying to such type of engine or machine.[18] Some statutes by their terms are inapplicable to cars propelled by electricity.[19]

Provisions have been construed which require full crews for "main line local freight trains."[20] Such provisions do not apply to trains properly classified as through trains,[21] or which operate over branch lines.[22]

(4) Train and Switching Movements

Unless the statute otherwise provides, "full crew" acts apply to train movements, but not to switching operations.

Unless the statute otherwise provides, "full crew" acts apply to train movements,[23] but not to switching operations,[24] the rules in this respect being similar to those obtaining under the air-brake provisions of the Federal Safety Appliance Act.[25] A train does not lose its character as such because it hauls only empty cars,[26] or because the engine is located in an unusual position,[27] or because in the course of the run it performs incidental switching operations.[28] Under some statutes, full-crew requirements are specifically applied to switching operations.[29] Under a statute requiring a specified crew on an engine or locomotive used to switch cars, a locomotive crane used for switching purposes is within the full-crew requirement.[30]

Some statutes are by their terms applicable only to trains operated over any part of the road in excess of a specified number of continuous miles, with certain exceptions,[31] and under such a statute a railroad operation outside of the state will not be added to one within the state in order to make up the number of miles of operation rendering the statute applicable.[32]

Splitting a train with two engines so that neither section has a full crew is a violation of the statutes.[33]

(5) Character and Location of Crew

A statute requiring that trains be manned and operated by a certain number of employees classified by the duties performed, such as brakeman or flagman, refers to duties generally associated with the specified positions by custom and practice; and, while the required employees may perform duties other than those to which they are assigned, having an employee primarily engaged in other duties but subject to call to fill the position specified by the statute does not fulfill the statutory duty.

Where the statute requires that trains be manned and operated by a certain number of employees classified by the duties performed, such as brakeman or flagman, it refers to duties generally associated with the specified positions by custom and practice.[34] The statute does not mean that employees cannot perform duties other than those to which they are assigned, and if employees are qualified to perform duties of the position to which they are assigned and are at all times available to perform them when the need therefor arises and they actually do perform them, the requirement of the statute is met even though the employees are assigned to, and do perform, other duties.[35] So, where a statute requires a brakeman on a train, and a person is primarily employed as a brakeman and only performs other duties if and when his duties as brakeman permit, compliance with the statute is shown.[36] On the other hand, having an employee engaged in other duties but subject to call as a brakeman or flagman does not fulfill the statutory duty to provide a brakeman or flagman,[37] although there is some authority apparently to the contrary.[38] Under a statute requiring the posting of a brakeman between every two cars of a passenger train, it is not necessary that there should be a brakeman at each end of each car.[39] An ordinance requiring brakemen on trains moved within city limits to be so stationed as to

a. Regulation in General

Subject to constitutional and statutory restrictions, a board or commission may, in the reasonable exercise of its regulatory powers, require the presence of agents at stations; but it may not arbitrarily impose such a requirement regardless of the expense entailed on the railroad or benefit to be derived by the public.

Subject to constitutional and statutory restrictions, a board or commission may, under its general power to regulate the operation of railroads, in the reasonable exercise of its regulatory powers, require the presence of agents at stations,[41] who, when the circumstances demand it, may be required to be capable of rendering routine telegraph service.[42] The power to require the presence of agents at stations may be derived from express statutory provision,[43] or, under a statute empowering a commission to compel adequate heating and lighting of depots, the commission may have implied power to compel maintenance of station agents.[44] However, under a statute granting a board or commission power to regulate the location of stations and the establishment of freight and passenger buildings, it lacks implied power to regulate the selection of station employees.[45] In any event, orders of a board or commission relative to agents at stations must be reasonable.[46] So the commission may not arbitrarily require the employment of a station agent regardless of the expense entailed on the railroad or benefit to be derived by the public, but the commission is only authorized to make such an order in that regard as the public interests demand and as may be reasonable and just.[47] In accordance with the circumstances involved, particular orders have been held reasonable[48] or unreasonable.[49]

b. Duty of Railroad

A railroad is ordinarily under a duty to provide and maintain agents at stations, where reasonably necessary, but apart from statute, such duty is at most incidental to the railroad's primary and absolute duty of furnishing transportation services, and it is not obligated to maintain an agent at every one of its stations, as at a station where the volume of business is not sufficient reasonably to demand the services of such an employee.

While it has been said that unless a statute provides otherwise, a railroad has plenary power to determine whether or not it should keep an agent at any station,[50] railroads are ordinarily under a duty to provide and maintain agents at stations,[51] where reasonably necessary.[52] However such duty, apart from statute, is at most incidental to the railroad's primary and absolute duty of furnishing transportation services,[53] and it is not obligated to maintain an agent at every one of its stations,[54] as at a station where the volume of business is not sufficient reasonably to demand the services of such an employee.[55] The employees which a railroad must maintain at a station need only be adequate for requirements of the station, and should be in a measure commensurate with the patronage and receipts from that portion of the public for whom services are rendered[56]

The duty to provide an agent may sometimes be implied from statutory provisions relative to depots generally,[57] but such provisions have also been construed as not imposing a mandatory requirement to maintain an agency station rather than a nonagency station in charge of a caretaker[58] Under a statute providing in one section that every railroad shall provide at all villages and cities suitable freight and passenger depots, and in a succeeding section that, where the annual business "at any station" exceeds a specified amount, the railroad shall keep an agent there, the road must keep an agent at a station with the requisite amount of business irrespective of whether such station is in an incorporated or unincorporated village.[59] Under a statute requiring an agent at any station where the annual business exceeds a specified sum, such sum is to be measured by the volume of business at the station,[60] irrespective of the particular railroad ultimately securing the business,[61] and irrespective of the question of profit[62]

c. Discontinuance of Agency

(1) Power and proceedings of commission

(2) When discontinuance proper

(1) Power and Proceedings of Commission

Under various statutes, a railroad may not discontinue the services of agents at stations without securing the permission of the appropriate board or commission, but such board or commission must act reasonably in the matter and its determination must be supported by sufficient evidence, and its order is subject to judicial review

Under various statutes and administrative regulations, a railroad may not discontinue the services of agents at stations without securing the permission of the board or commission charged with the regulation of railroads,[63] but such board or commission generally has the power to direct or to authorize the discontinuance of a station agency,[64]

Disproportionate cost

A railroad should not be required to maintain an agency station instead of being permitted to substitute a prepay station therefor when cost of service involved in maintaining agency station is out of proportion to revenue derived from that portion of public benefited thereby, especially where a substitute service may be provided which will afford the same essential service but which is less convenient —Illinois Cent. Public convenience and necessity

The statute requiring railroads carrying passengers or freight to maintain depots where railroad receives and delivers passengers and freight at all towns and villages having population of two hundred or more does not mandatorily require an agency station at such places, but requires that the manner of operating railroad depots in such communities must be conformable with public convenience and necessity —Illinois Cent. Power not impaired by statute

The Public Utilities Act, creating the commerce commission, is complete in itself, covers the entire subject of public utilities, and vests in the commission general supervision over all public utilities, including the power to determine whether a station agency may be discontinued, which power is not impaired by the requirements of the Railroad and Warehouse Act providing that railroad shall build and maintain depots in all towns and villages with a population of two hundred or more and requiring certain services in connection with such depots.—Illinois Cent. R. Co v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 74 N.E.2d 545, 397 Ill 323.

Commission has jurisdiction to hear and grant or deny, as public interest requires, railway company's application for leave to discontinue agency and withdraw station agent at certain point.—Denver & S. L Ry. Co. v. St. Clair, 28 P.2d 340, 94 Colo. 67.

Burden on protestants

The fact that railroad, instead of closing its agency station at speci-

even in the case of a station agency created by special act of the legislature.[65] A contract between a railroad and some of its employees regulating the terms and conditions of employment may not control or affect the power of the commission in passing on the railroad's application for authority to withdraw full-time agents from certain stations and to substitute caretaker service in lieu thereof[66]

The commission in determining whether an agency station should be discontinued must act reasonably,[67] and its determination must be supported by sufficient evidence.[68] So an order of the commission granting or denying a railroad company permission to substitute a caretaker for an agent is unreasonable and arbitrary unless its findings and conclusions conform to the law and are supported by the evidence.[69] In a proper case, the commission should on denying the railroad's application grant a rehearing to consider additional matters affecting the situation.[70] fied point, applied to commission for affirmative authority to close it, did not alter necessity of protestants making affirmative case against proposed discontinuance—In re Denver & R. G. W. R. Co., 24 P.2d 727, 37 N.M. 472.

Discontinuance for certain months

Application to discontinue station as agency station for certain months held properly denied on original hearing, where original application did not request such suspension—Los Angeles & S. L. R. Co. v. Public Utilities Commission of Utah, 15 P.2d 358, 80 Utah 455.

Mediation of dispute

Where commission had not been requested to mediate dispute between railroad and its employees, fact that constitution required commission on request to effect by mediation a settlement of controversies between transportation companies and their employees did not justify commission's dismissal of railroad's applications for authority to change type of service at three stations because of railroad's failure to give notice required by contract between it and some of its employees, where that contract could in no way affect commission's jurisdiction over applications—Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co. v. State, supra.

Suspension for limited time

Denial of railroad's application for

As a general rule, the action of the commission in granting or denying an application to discontinue agency service at a station is subject to review in the courts [71] In such a judicial proceeding, the findings and order of the commission are presumed to be valid and supported by sufficient evidence.[72] and the burden is on the railroad attacking the order to show its invalidity [73] In other words, the findings and order of the commission, if supported by competent evidence, will be binding on the court,[74] and the commission's determination will be disturbed only when it is shown that the commission abused its discretion or failed to follow the law [75] On review of a board or commission's order relative to station agents, the courts will consider neither a private agreement relative to maintenance of a station agency,[76] except as it may bear on the question of reasonableness,[77] nor the circumstances connected with discontinuance of an agency previously maintained at the station in question [78] If the findings and conclusions of the commission do not conform to the law and are not supported by the evidence, so that the order of the commission is unreasonable, the court may reverse or vacate such order [79] In such case, it has been held, the judgment of the court should sion for further proceedings, since only the commission has authority to grant the relief requested by the railroad [80] The judgment of the court may be subject to further appellate review [81]

Rebuttal by evidence
The "prima facie" effect of corporation commission's action in denying railway company's petition to discontinue regular station agent's services under constitutional provision requiring court to consider such action as "prima facie just, reasonable, and correct" constitutes mere presumption, which may disappear or be overthrown by evidence in record on appeal from commission's order, but to overcome presumption of correctness, contrary evidence must be strong and persuasive—Atchison, T & S F. Findings of fact
On judicial review of an order of the commission relating to railroad companies, such as an order refusing the proposed discontinuance by railroad of its agency at a particular station, the commission's findings of fact are prima facie correct and should not be set aside unless clearly against the weight of the evidence—Southern Ry. Conclusiveness of findings
(1) Finding by commission that a railroad was unable to furnish a modified substituted service at a station by employing a part-time employee, without breaching its contract with a labor union, was binding on appellate court—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Commonwealth ex rel State Corp. Commission, 61 S E 2d 5, 191 Va. 241.

(2) On appeal from judgment refusing to enjoin enforcement of commission's order denying railroad's application to change agency station to nonagency and prepay station, appellate court would not weigh the evidence or substitute its judgment

The ruling of the commission[82] or of the court[83] on the question of discontinuance of an agency at any given time does not amount to an adjudication for the future, but is only a judgment on the conditions presented by the application and relates only to the time and conditions presented. So where the commission denied an application by a railroad to discontinue a station agency, but at a later time the circumstances changed, the order of the commission is not res judiciata and the railroad at the later time may present a new application.[84] So also, railroad agency service discontinued with permission of the commission may be ordered restored whenever changed conditions justify such an order,[85] but restoration of agency service is not justified under evidence that there was only some increase in the business of the station covering the period from the date when the court authorized discontinuance of agency service.[86]

(2) When Discontinuance Proper

Whether or not a railroad may properly be entitled to discontinue an agency at a station generally depends on the facts of the particular case and ordinarily the test employed in determining the matter, where an absolutely necessary service is not involved, is whether the public good derived from maintenance of the agency station outweighs the expense to the railroad in continuing such agency.

Whether or not a railroad may properly be entitled to change a station for an agency to a nonagency or prepay station generally depends on the facts of the particular case.[87] The test generally applied in determining the matter, where an absolutely necessary service is not involved, is whether the public good derived from maintenance of the agency station outweighs the expense to the railroad in continuing such agency,[88] that is, whether the economic waste caused by the operation of the agency outweighs the benefits and conveniences to the public.[89] In this respect, the "public convenience and necessity" involved are those of the public generally and not of an individual or number of individuals.[90] The circumstances to be taken into consideration are the volume of busi-

Fact questions

Whether public is making use of railroad agency station, and whether the discontinuance of the agency will result in material inconvenience and loss to the public sufficient to require continuation of the agency, are fact questions—Illinois Cent R Co v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 74 N. E 2d 893, 397 Ill. 399.

Inconvenience

In determining whether railroad could discontinue maintenance of a station agent, it is just that public should bear some inconvenience rather than to impose upon railroad unnecessary expenses—Petition of Town of Grenville, 119 P.2d 632, 46 N M. 3.

89. Ill—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v Illinois Commerce Commission, 77 N. E 2d 180, 399 Ill. 67.

Financial condition

Fact that financial condition of railroad is excellent does not justify continuation of economic waste occasioned by retention of agency station when not in interest of public necessity and convenience—Atchison, T. & S. F Ry Co. v Illinois Commerce Commission, 74 N.E 2d 885, 397 Ill. 406.

ness done at the station, its proximity to other stations, the accessibility thereof, the cost of maintaining such agency station, the financial loss, if any, to the railroad company, due regard for the welfare of the public, and the probabilities of future development.[91] On a petition for permission to abandon agency service at a station, the board or commission has power to consider only the question of public needs,[92] and the effect of a private contract cannot be considered.[93]

Broadly speaking, the railroad is under no duty to provide an agent at a station where the volume of business is not sufficient reasonably to demand the services of such an employee, as discussed supra subdivision b of this section, and in connection with an application for discontinuance it is unreasonable to require the maintenance of an agency station where the cost of the service is out of proportion to the revenue derived from the portion of the public benefited thereby,[94] particularly where a substitute service may be provided affording the same essential, although less convenient, service.[95] The question of loss to the railroad as a result of the agency ordinarily is an important factor to be considered,[96] but a loss[97] amounting to confiscation[98] need not be proved before the railroad is entitled to abandon the agency. Under some circumstances, operation of the agency station at a loss may warrant its discontinuance although the railroad as a whole is operated at a profit;[99] but it has also been held that the incidental loss at the station may not be of paramount importance if the entire operation of the railroad is profitable or if the operation throughout the state is profitable.[1]

Financial condition not only factor
In determining whether public convenience and necessity require abandonment of railroad and railway express agency service at particular station, financial condition of entire system is but one of factors to be taken into consideration, other factors being volume of business done at station, number of people to be accommodated, present facilities, proximity to other agency stations, and cost of furnishing such services—Illinois Cent R. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 74 N.E.2d 545, 397 Ill. 323.

Time necessary for performance of duties by railroad agent is important in determining whether railway commission acted arbitrarily and unreasonably in denying application for discontinuance of agency—Application of Union Pac R Co, 31 N W 2d 552, 149 Neb 575—Application of Thomson, 6 N W 2d 607, 142 Neb. 477.

Erroneous calculation
On application by railroad for discontinuance of regular agent's services at certain station, commission erred in including in its calculation of company's revenue from business handled at such station free shipments of materials and equipment used by construction company in revising grade on portion of railway company's roadbed under contract with such company, in view of undisputed testimony that such shipments were not recurring and did not comprise portion of such business during average period—Lowden v. Where absolute duty not involved In determining whether railroad should be allowed to discontinue its agency at a particular station, the question of loss to railroad as result of the agency is of greater importance than in case involving an absolute duty of railroad to render a service.—Southern Ry. Co v. Public Service Commission, supra.

Income not major consideration
(1) Income from business done at village station on great transportation system is not entitled to major consideration in passing on application for discontinuance of station agency—Application of Union Pac. (2) While income of a railroad station is an element to be considered in determining whether an agency shall be discontinued, it is not in itself controlling but must be considered with all other elements bearing on reasonableness under the circumstances—Application of Thomson, 6 N.W.2d 607, 142 Neb. 477.

99. Ill.—Illinois Cent. R. Co v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 74 N.E 2d 526, 397 Ill. 387.

1. S C—Southern Ry. Co v. Public Service Commission, 10 S.E.2d 769, 195 S.C 247.

In any event, the matter of profits and loss to the railroad may not be conclusive in every case, since the proposed change in the character of the service rendered must be considered in relation to the public convenience and necessity,[2] although the public convenience or necessity which would require continuance of the agency even though a loss were sustained must be shown to be unusual in kind or degree.[3] The need for agency service should not be measured by financial results alone, but also by the agent's usefulness to the company as well as to the public,[4] and a high per cent of station costs as compared with the revenue creditable to that station is not alone sufficient to justify the discontinuance of the agency at such station.[5]

A contemplated future increase in railroad transportation and the resulting increase in station business is a factor which should be given consideration in determining the need for retention of agency service at a station,[6] but it is unreasonable to deny permission to substitute a caretaker for an agent on that premise unless well-defined business prospects are established by the evidence with reasonable certainty.[7] Future business which may arise because of a state of war has been held too speculative to be considered.[8] A railroad will not be required to maintain an agency simply to carry on the pay roll unnecessary employees during an industrial depression.[9]

§ 403. Stations and Station Facilities

A railroad company generally is required to maintain a sufficient number of stations. Unless otherwise provided by statutory or constitutional provision, a railroad has the primary right to name its own stations

In pursuance of its duty to provide adequate facilities for the transportation of passengers and freight, discussed supra § 390, a railroad company is required to maintain a sufficient number of stations,[10] and to provide reasonably adequate accommodations and facilities at such stations, as discussed infra § 406. A statute regulating the maintenance of stations and facilities at certain places is applicable only to stations at the designated places.[11] Ordinarily a railroad has complete discretion as to which nearby station shall handle the business of a shipper, in the absence of objection by the shipper.[12] A railroad will not be required to establish new or additional stations where the cost of maintaining them would exceed the profits to the company and the public is already reasonably provided for by the stations established.[13]

Name of station. In the absence of statutory or constitutional provisions providing otherwise, a railroad has the primary right to name its own stations[14] except in cases where a name so chosen materially detracts from the efficiency of the service which the company must furnish to the public.[15] Under a statute requiring a railroad station in an incorporated village to have the same name as such village, a station which is half in one village and half in another village cannot be changed to the name of the second village against the railroad's dissent.[16] Under constitutional provisions granting to a board or commission broad power to control and regulate the operation of a railroad, it may require a railroad to change the name of a station where reasonably necessary for public convenience.[17]

Mere fact that gross revenue at railroad agency station, furnishing freight service only exceeded the wages paid the station agent was not decisive as to whether public convenience and necessity required railroad to continue to maintain the agency station where eighty-three per cent of gross revenue received at station was contributed by a single company the shipping needs of which would be satisfied by another station less than six miles away.—Illinois Cent. Wash.—State v. Department of Public Works, 3 P.2d 999, 164 Wash. 563.

a. Regulation by State in General

In the exercise of its regulatory power, a state may require the maintenance of adequate stations at certain places and may control and regulate the furnishing of necessary and proper accommodations and facilities thereat.

In the exercise of its regulatory power, a state may require the maintenance of adequate stations at certain places[18] and may control and regulate the furnishing of necessary and proper accommodations and facilities thereat[19] The power of the state to regulate the furnishing of accommodations and facilities at stations must be exercised in accordance with constitutional limitations and cannot be used to compel the railroad to furnish facilities for purposes foreign to transportation[20] Uncertainty[21] or unreasonableness[22] will invalidate the statute.

b. Regulation by Board or Commission in General

The legislature may delegate to a board or commission its power to regulate accommodations and facilities at stations. The regulatory power of the board or commission is derived from, and coextensive with, the constitutional and statutory provisions creating it, and the exercise of such power must be reasonable

The legislature may delegate to a board or commission its power to regulate accommodations and facilities at stations[23] The power of a board or commission to regulate accommodations and facilities at stations is derived from, and coextensive with, the constitutional and statutory provisions creating it.[24] Under statutes empowering a board or commission to regulate the general operation of railroads, it may regulate the furnishing of facilities at stations,[25] although it has been said that the railroad should be accorded primary discretion in such matters.[26] Subject to, and in accordance with, constitutional or statutory provisions, a board or commission may not only be empowered to direct, but may be under a duty to direct the furnishing of adequate facilities at stations.[27] Under some statutes a service established at a station by voluntary action of a railroad or by order of the commission may not be abandoned except by order of the commission after a hearing.[28]

Exercise of power. Generally speaking, rules, regulations, and orders of a board or commission relative to stations and accommodations and facilities thereat must be reasonable[29] except, it has been held, where the statute is mandatory.[30] The reasonableness of a general rule or regulation should not, however, be tested by a single application there-

Transfer of business

Where railroad desired to transfer refining company's business from one nearby station to another, and refining company made no objection, the commission was without authority to prevent transfer, merely as device to enhance railroad's revenues at station from which railroad desired to have business transferred and use enhancement as a reason for refusing to abolish the agency at that station as desired by railroad.—Lowden v. of [31]

A board or commission may require the furnishing of essential accommodations and facilities at stations even though a loss will be sustained by the road in connection therewith [32] If, however, enforcement entails a loss to the road on its entire operation, the regulation will be held unreasonable [33] Where accommodations or facilities are merely convenient rather than essential to public welfare, the reasonableness of orders to furnish them will be determined by balancing the relative expense to the road against the relative convenience to the public,[34] and such orders will not be enforced if the burden on the road is disproportionate to the public benefit.[35] Commissioners may properly consider prospective public business at stations in determining what facilities may be required [36]

§ 405. —— Depots and Waiting Rooms

a. Regulations
b. Duty of company to provide
c. Maintenance and care of depots

a. Regulations

(1) In general
(2) Union depots

(1) In General

A state or regulatory commission may require a railroad to build or provide depots and waiting rooms, and may prescribe the kind, capacity, and construction materials of the buildings; but orders, regulations, and requirements of this nature generally must be reasonable.

Among the regulatory powers of a state or of a board or commission may be included the power to require a railroad to build or provide suitable depots and waiting rooms.[37] Such power includes by implication power to prescribe the kind,[38] capacity,[39] and construction materials[40] of the buildings, and to order the enlargement of an existing depot [41] However, orders, regulations, and requirements in the exercise of this power must be reasonable,[42] although, under a mandatory statute requiring erection of depots at stations, a commission's order for the erection of a depot is not subject to a test of reasonableness.[43] An arbitrary rejection of a railroad's counterplan for improvements applied for has been held to be unreasonable.[44] A statute requiring railroads to furnish "convenient and suitable" waiting rooms is not void for uncertainty.[45]

Powers under particular statutes. Under a statute providing that railroad commissioners shall have general supervision of all railroads, and shall, whenever in their judgment reasonable and expedient, institute proceedings respecting additions to, or change of, station houses, commissioners may require erection of a depot at an existing station.[46] Under a statute authorizing a commission to direct a railroad to provide depots at regular stations, the commission may direct erection of depots at established stations.[47] Under a statute authorizing a commission to direct a railroad to provide depots at points where the revenue is sufficient to justify it, the commission may direct erection of depots at points along the railroad which are not established stations.[48] Under statutes authorizing a board or commission to order a railroad to make any reasonable addition to, or change of, its stations and station houses, whenever necessary for the security or convenience of the public, it has power to order replacement of existing and inadequate depots[49] Under statutes empowering a railroad commission to direct, after hearing, any addition to, or change of, stations or station houses, the commission may, at an established station, require the furnishing of a freight depot as well as one for passengers.[50]

On the other hand, under statutes requiring a railroad to provide adequate passenger depot buildings at its regular stations, and, where required by order of a commission, to provide adequate depot buildings for passengers and freight where public necessity demands and traffic revenue justifies it, the commission lacks authority to compel the construction of an entirely new building to replace an existing depot[51] Also, under a statute authorizing a board or commission to order the erection of a new station to replace one "burned or otherwise destroyed," the board lacks power to order construction of a new station to replace an existing station of inadequate character.[52]

Under constitutional provisions expressly empowering a commission to compel a railroad to comply with requirements as to adequate facilities at stations, the only limitation on the commission's power to order erection of depots is that its action shall be reasonable and just.[53] Under constitutional provisions authorizing a board or commission to require a railroad to provide adequate, comfortable, and clean depots, it has power to prescribe the materials of which a new depot shall be built.[54]

(2) Union Depots

A state or board or commission may direct or order the establishment of union depots by two or more railroads entering the same town or city, but such directions or orders must be reasonable.

The legislature of a state may require railroad companies to establish and use union depots,[55] and it may impose the costs of construction and operation of the station on the railroads concerned, as long as the expense is not so great as to be confiscatory when considered in relation to the importance of the interests to be affected and to be served.[56] Moreover, the state may delegate to a board or commission the power to determine the necessity for establishment of a union depot,[57] and accordingly, under statutes conferring on a board or commission power to require two or more railroads entering the same town or city to erect, operate, and maintain a joint passenger terminal, or union depot, the board or commission has power to compel such railroads to erect, operate, and maintain a union depot.[58]

The commission is authorized to do whatever is reasonably necessary in order to carry out its power,[59] and it can compel the railroads jointly to purchase or condemn the lands needed and to construct thereon a union depot.[60] The commission is limited, however, to the power conferred by the statute,[61]

Penalties
A statute authorizing railroad commissioners to impose a penalty on any railroad doing business in the state for violation of any "rule" or "regulation" does not authorize their imposition of a penalty on railroad companies failing to comply with an "order" to erect a union depot on or by a fixed date.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co v. State, 74 So. 595, 73 Fla. 609.
Validity of contract
Whether contract by the carrier for facilities of a union depot was improvident, or the action unlawful, was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the interstate commerce commission and not within the jurisdic-

and it may lack power to compel a terminal company to erect a new union depot[62] or to compel railroads to erect a union depot to furnish general terminal facilities and connections for interchange of traffic by any and all railroads.[63] The order of the commission is not rendered invalid by its failure to require the building to be erected according to plans and specifications furnished by the commission.[64] The directions or orders of a commission with respect to the establishment of a union depot must be reasonable.[65] There is a presumption in favor of an order of a commission which requires the establishment of a union depot,[66] and unless it is shown to be unjust, unreasonable, or otherwise improper it will be upheld.[67]

A commission may be created for the purpose of enabling a city to solve problems created by the entrance into its limits of many great railroad systems,[68] with power to contract on behalf of the city with the railroads so as to procure more adequate and convenient terminal and station facilities.[69] The action of the commission in making the contract will be upheld unless the contract is so utterly unjustified by any fair reason and results in such unmitigated and overwhelming disadvantage to the city as to bear on its face evidence which is conclusive of fraud, corruption, or bad faith.[70]

b. Duty of Company to Provide

Apart from statute or constitutional provision, a railroad company need not provide depot structures for passengers or freight, but under constitutional or statutory provisions as to such matters a railroad may have the duty to provide such structures, regardless of expense, although the duty may be limited to specified locations by the terms of the statute.

In the absence of some mandatory regulation requiring it, a railroad need not provide depot structures for passengers[71] or freight.[72] On the other hand, under constitutional or statutory provisions expressly requiring a railroad to provide stations or depots for passengers and freight, the duty to do so is mandatory.[73] Such statutory requirements are not affected by subsequent laws creating a regulatory board and providing that no act of such board shall impair the legal duties of a railroad.[74] Statutes merely empowering railroad to erect passenger and freight depots do not impose a duty to do so.[75]

Construction of order of board or commission. A statute empowering a board or commission to require the provision of a depot does not impose on the railroad the duty to do so in the absence of an order to that effect by such board or commission.[76] Where, however, the order has been made, existence of leased facilities will not excuse noncompliance.[77] The existence of a state of war may be sufficient to excuse noncompliance with an order theretofore made for construction of a new depot.[78]

Statutes relative to "accommodations" and "facilities." Under a statute providing that every railroad shall furnish reasonably adequate service, equipment, and facilities, a railroad is under a duty to provide reasonably adequate depots for passengers[79] and freight.[80] On the other hand, under statutes requiring a railroad to furnish "sufficient accommodation for the transportation" of passengers and property, it has been held that a road is not obligated to provide a depot.[81]

tion of the public utilities commission.—Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co v. Public Utilities Commission, 166 N. E. 372, 120 Ohio St 434.

vide depots, the road cannot escape its obligation on the plea of expense.[82] However, when the duty to provide depots is one which may or may not be imposed by a board or commission, the duty to provide a depot is merely incidental to the prime duty to furnish transportation,[83] and questions of relative expense and public convenience may properly be considered in determining the road's obligation to provide a depot.[84]

Waiting rooms. Under statutes so providing, a railroad may be required to provide waiting rooms at stations.[85] Under statutes requiring waiting rooms at all stations, a railroad need not provide a waiting room at a stopping place which is not a station[86] or at all places where tickets are sold.[87] A statute requiring railroads to provide waiting rooms at all villages has been held to refer to incorporated villages, and not to every isolated hamlet at which a railroad may have a flag station.[88] Under statutes requiring railroads to furnish "convenient and suitable" waiting rooms, the room must be reasonably adequate for public requirements,[89] the question of what constitutes such a waiting room being primarily one of fact.[90] A statute requiring separate waiting-room accommodations for white and African races does not require railroad companies to erect depot buildings at places where they have none,[91] and is not applicable to a mere flag station without any building belonging to, or used by, the company as a depot.[92]

c. Maintenance and Care of Depots

A railroad generally has the duty to maintain depots in a safe condition, to light, heat, and ventilate them adequately, and to keep them open a reasonable time both before arrival and after departure of trains.

If a railroad not under a duty to provide depots voluntarily erects them, thereby inviting persons having business with the road to enter and use them, they must be maintained in a safe condition,[93] this duty existing apart from statute.[94]

Duty to keep open. A railroad ordinarily is under a duty to keep its ticket offices open a reasonable time before departure of trains[95] and to keep its waiting rooms open a reasonable time both before arrival and after departure of trains.[96] These duties may be imposed by statute[97] or by a rule or order of a board or commission to which the authority has been delegated,[98] but the duty to keep open the waiting rooms of established depots a reasonable period before and after train time exists independently of statute.[99] Permission to close a depot during a portion of the year may be granted in proper and reasonable circumstances.[1]

Particular statutory provisions. A statute requiring railroads to keep ticket offices open a specified time before the scheduled departure of passenger trains from "every regular passenger depot" does not apply to flag stations from which only the regular fare is charged cash passengers.[2] Statutes requiring waiting rooms to be kept open for trains at all regular stations require the road to keep open waiting rooms at all stations where the train awaited is scheduled to stop,[3] but does not apply to flag stations as respects trains not regularly scheduled to stop there,[4] or to places not at a station.[5]

open a specified time before and after arrival of trains have been construed as inapplicable to through passengers stopping over at junction points,[6] and as not requiring the road to keep its waiting room open an unreasonable length of time.[7] Under a statute requiring railroads to provide "crossings, stations, and other facilities," a road has been held under an implied duty to keep its waiting rooms open at the time advertised for departure of trains.[8]

Duty to light, heat, and ventilate. As a general rule, a railroad maintaining a depot must keep it adequately lighted[9] and heated,[10] when necessary for use of its patrons. A statute expressly requiring railroads to keep their depots heated for a specified period before and after arrival of trains does not relieve the road of its general duty to keep depots heated at other times when they are properly in use by passengers.[11] Even though included in a statute requiring construction and maintenance of depots at specified places, a provision as to heating depots, if general in its language, will be applied to all depots and not restricted to those of the statutory description.[12] Under statutes requiring waiting rooms to be kept open for specified periods, the railroad is under no obligation to heat[13] or ventilate[14] its waiting rooms at any other time.

§ 406. —— Station Accommodations and Facilities in General

A railroad is obligated to provide reasonably adequate accommodations and facilities at its stations.

As a general rule a railroad is obligated to provide reasonably adequate accommodations and facilities at its stations.[15] In so far as a station accommodation or facility is essential to performance of the primary duty of transportation, the road is obligated to provide it regardless of remuneration;[16] but, in so far as such accommodation or facility is not essential, the duty to furnish it will depend on relative expense and public benefit.[17] In other words, the facilities to be furnished at any station need only be adequate to the requirement of the station, and should be in a measure commensurate with the patronage and receipts from that portion of the public to which the service is rendered.[18] The fact, however, that the cost of rendering certain service would be more than the revenue received at the station would not alone be sufficient to permit the railroad to discontinue the service.[19]

Prospective needs should be anticipated by the railroad in providing adequate station facilities.[20]

Effect of contract. Where a railroad has contracted with the state relative to station facilities, the contract governs its obligations.[21]

§ 407. —— Train Bulletins

Statutes requiring railroad companies to maintain blackboards at stations and to register data thereon respecting the time of arrival of trains have been held valid and enforceable.

held valid and enforceable [22] Such statutes have been held inapplicable to a short-haul suburban road.[23] They do not require establishment of a telegraph office at a station lacking telegraphic facilities[24] or prevent the abandonment of a telegraph office already established [25] Where a board or commission has power under constitution or statute to order installation of telegraphic service to bulletin trains, such order must be reasonable to be enforceable [26]

Repeal of statute requiring train bulletins is a good defense to an action for a penalty brought under such statute.[27]

§ 408. —— Other Facilities

a. In general
b. Telephone and telegraph facilities
c. Toilets

a. In General

A railroad may be required, in a proper case, to construct and maintain industrial sidings or sidetracks, track scales, and umbrella sheds.

The general duty of a railroad to provide reasonably adequate accommodations and facilities at its stations has been enforced with respect to particular facilities[28] other than those discussed supra §§ 405-407. Within its powers to regulate the operation of railroads, a state or a board or commission under authority delegated to it may direct and regulate the installment of industrial sidings or sidetracks at stations for the benefit of the public in loading and unloading,[29] and also the relocation of rails near a station in order to provide additional platform space,[30] but such regulations and requirements must be reasonable [31] A statute providing that under specified conditions a shipper may apply to a railroad for private sidetracks and switches, and, on failure or refusal of the road to grant the application the district court may compel it to do so, does not deprive a public commission of authority under a prior statute to order the construction of suitable and adequate sidetracks for public use at a station.[32] Sidings should, where required by traffic, be constructed and operated as a public, and not a private, convenience.[33]

Track scales. While it has been held that a state may have power to require a railroad to install track scales at its stations where the railroad business may justify it,[34] and may delegate the power to a commission,[35] it has also been held by the supreme court of the United States that a state cannot compel a railroad to install cattle scales at a station as a means for building up a private business,[36] however much the public would be benefited thereby.[37] Whether hoof stock scales are a necessary facility for receiving and delivering freight, which a commission may be authorized to require a railroad to install and maintain, depends on whether such scales are required or are reasonably necessary for such purpose,[38] and the burden rests on him who asserts the necessity to prove it.[39]

Where a statute imposing the duty of furnishing track scales at all stations of a specified character has been followed by a later statute authorizing a board or commission to order such scales when in its judgment this is necessary, the board or commission lacks power to order track scales under the first statute.[40] Where a statute authorizing a commission to order a railroad to install track scales for weighing of cars and freight at stations of specified size on demand of a shipper has been followed by enactment of a later statute empowering the commission to enforce reasonable regulations for the weighing of cars and freight, the commission lacks power to order installation of track scales under the former statute.[41]

Umbrella sheds. Under statutes giving a board or commission general power to regulate operation of railroads, it may require the furnishing of umbrella sheds.[42] Under statutes empowering railroad commissioners to require the establishment of stations and the erection of freight and passenger depots, houses, and platforms, and to regulate all matters affecting the safety, comfort, convenience, and accommodation of passengers, the commissioners may direct the erection of umbrella sheds[43] However, under such statutory provisions, there is no power to require union umbrella sheds to be erected by intersecting roads with separate tracks.[44]

b. Telephone and Telegraph Facilities

A board or commission may have the power to regulate the furnishing of telephones and telegraph service at stations. A railroad is under a duty to supply telephone and telegraph facilities of an adequate character where reasonably necessary in connection with its primary service of public transportation.

Under constitutional or statutory provisions granting a board or commission general power to regulate the furnishing of facilities and conveniences at stations, it may regulate the furnishing of telephones[45] and telegraph service.[46]

Duty of company. Under constitutional provisions requiring a railroad to provide and maintain adequate depots, agents, and facilities for the accommodation of passengers and freight, a road is under a duty to supply telephone[47] and telegraph[48] facilities of an adequate character[49] where reasonably necessary in connection with its primary service of public transportation. The railroad cannot, however, be compelled to furnish such facilities beyond the reasonable requirements of such service;[50] nor is it under a duty to provide facilities of this character for general public use aside from transportation[51] or in its capacity as a private corporation.[52] Under a statute providing that every railroad corporation shall grant to specified kinds of telephone concerns equal and reasonable terms, arrangements, and facilities for installation of telephones in its depots, the railroad is not obligated to grant installation to one company on the same terms theretofore granted another if conditions affecting the two companies are dissimilar.[53]

A state or a board or commission may be authorized to require toilets at depots or stations and to regulate them, and a railroad company may have the duty to provide such facilities at depots or stations.

and to regulate them,[54] but such requirements and regulations must be reasonable.[55]

Duty of company to provide. As a general rule, a railroad may be required to provide privies at all depots or stations,[56] and under the terms of some statutes the road must provide one even at a depot of a temporary character,[57] but not at flag stations without depots.[58] Under a statute requiring water-closets or privies to be constructed at each passenger station either within the depot, or in connection therewith, or at a reasonable distance therefrom, a railroad is not obligated to provide a toilet at a station where there is no depot,[59] and this is true even though the road's failure to provide a depot is a violation of another statute.[60] The absence of a waterworks in the municipality does not relieve a railroad from its statutory duty to provide a toilet at a station.[61]

Companies within statutes. Under a statute requiring toilets to be provided at stations by any railroad company "operating a line of railway" within the state, a company operating a line as lessee is obligated to provide toilets at its stations.[62]

(2) Location, Character, and Condition

A station toilet should be located at a point reasonably convenient and accessible to the depot, should be maintained in good condition, and should be of a character suitable under the circumstances existing in the vicinity.

A station toilet should be located at a point reasonably convenient and accessible to the depot[63] in view of prevailing conditions.[64] If the railroad provides separate toilets for the sexes, each must be conveniently located.[65]

Station toilets should be suitable for women and children as well as men,[66] maintained in proper condition,[67] and, generally speaking, should be such as to meet the requirements of normal traffic conditions[68] and of a character suitable under circumstances existing in the vicinity.[69] Under a statute requiring every railroad to provide at all depots in towns and cities "water-closet or privies," the word "privy" is synonymous with "water-closet,"[70] the purpose of the statute being merely to require adequate toilet facilities of some description.[71]

Lighting. Under a statute requiring railroads to keep water-closets lighted for specified periods at all stations where they receive and discharge passengers in the nighttime, the road must light water-closets at stations where passengers are received or discharged on flagging of the train.[72] The existence of moonlight cannot relieve the road of its duty to supply artificial light under such statute.[73]

Locking. The toilet may be kept locked when necessary,[74] provided the key is available[75] when reasonably required.[76]

approval of such commission before a railroad may discontinue a depot, flag stop, station, or office, the action of the commission in approving or disapproving discontinuance of the facility is subject to review in the courts

Where a rule of a railroad commission requires the approval of such commission before a railroad may discontinue a depot, flag stop, station, or office, the action of the commission in approving or disapproving discontinuance of the facility is subject to review in the courts.[77] A rule of railroad commissioners forbidding a road to close, remove, suspend, or abolish an existing station without prior authority from the commission is not violated by a mere change in the nature of the structure.[78]

§ 410. Switches, Spurs, and Sidings

Sidetracks constituting part of a transportation system are among the works and appendages usual in the convenient operation of a railroad and are "facilities" of the railroad, even though privately owned.

Sidetracks constituting part of a transportation system are among the works and appendages usual in the convenient operation of a railroad and are "facilities" of the railroad, even though privately owned.[79] So it has been held that a segment of a spur track owned by a private company not a carrier is nevertheless subject to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act because of its use by an interstate rail carrier under trackage agreements.[80] A spur track constructed by a railroad at its own expense and maintained by it constitutes a "public spur" and a "public highway" within a constitutional provision that all railroads are declared to be public highways so that a person owning property abutting the right of way on which the spur is situated has a right to request service over such spur.[81] A railroad constructing a spur track can by contract with the persons over whose property the track is located protect itself from fire hazards resulting from operation of such track in the absence of a statute making such a contract unlawful.[82] The owner and operator of a spur track over which adjoining owners receive rail service may, in his discretion, dismantle and abandon such track where he is under no contractual or statutory obligation to maintain the track.[83]

§ 411. —— Regulation by State or Municipality

Within its power to regulate the operation of railroads, the state may have power to regulate switches, spurs, and sidings, as by requiring railroads to construct public spur tracks or preventing discontinuance of them

Within its powers to regulate the operation of railroads, the state may have power to regulate switches, spurs, and sidings,[84] as by requiring railroads to construct public spur tracks,[85] or preventing discontinuance of them,[86] or by ordering restoration of a switch connection.[87] Although it is beyond the police power of the state to compel a railroad to install switches, spurs, or sidings for private use at its own expense,[88] statutes or other regulations requiring construction of private switches, spurs, or sidings with adequate provision for apportionment of expense are valid.[89]

§ 412. —— Regulation by Board or Commission

a. Existence and extent of power
b. Exercise of power

a. Existence and Extent of Power

(1) In general
(2) Under particular statutory or constitutional provisions

(1) In General

The power of a board or commission to regulate a railroad with respect to the construction, maintenance, and operation of switches, spurs, and sidings is founded on constitution or statute, and measured in extent and limits by the provisions creating the power.

The power of a board or commission to regulate a railroad with respect to the construction, maintenance, and operation of switches, spurs, and sidings is founded on constitution or statute,[91] and measured in extent and limits by the provisions creating the power.[92] Within constitutional limitations as applied to this particular matter,[93] the state may delegate to a board or commission the regulation of switches, spurs, and sidings.[94] The regulatory power of a board ordinarily includes portions of a road operated but not owned by the road.[95] So a private spur track is subject to control and regulation of a board or commission under statutes providing for public use thereof.[96]

Charter. Even if a commission has power to compel a road to construct a spur not within its charter authority when public convenience so demands, the commission lacks power so to compel the road to construct the spur on an erroneous conclusion that its charter required such construction.[97]

Leased railroad land. A commission may have power to order a switch connection across railroad land leased to a private shipper[98] and to order payment by the shipper seeking the switch connection of compensation based on the expense to the lessee.[99]

(2) Under Particular Statutory or Constitutional Provisions

Particular statutory provisions have been construed with respect to the existence and extent of power conferred thereby on a board or commission to regulate the construction, maintenance, operation, and use of switches, spurs, and sidings.

Under a statute authorizing a commission to require a railroad to construct a switch for an abutting owner, the commission lacks power to require construction of a switch for a nonabutting owner.[1] Under a statute authorizing a commission to require construction of a siding to a point within a specified distance from the railroad, the commission cannot require construction of a siding to a point beyond the distance specified.[2] Under a statute requiring every railroad to furnish reasonably adequate service, equipment, and facilities, and authorizing a commission, if it finds a service inadequate, to direct one which is adequate, it is within the power of the commission to order construction of a public spur track.[3]

Under a statute providing that the commission shall have authority to prescribe rules with reference to the use, construction, removal, or change of spur or sidetracks, with due power to compel service to be furnished to manufacturing plants, warehouses, and similar places of business along the line where applicable, and where, in the judgment of the commission, business is sufficient to justify exercise of its authority, the commission is authorized to require railroad companies to construct spur and sidetracks within constitutional limitations,[4] which may be construed as restricting the power to requirement of spur or sidetracks for public use.[5]

Incidental powers. Under a statute providing that, on ordering a separation of the grades of a railway and street or highway, the commission may order restoration of an industrial spur track and shall, by order, direct apportionment of the costs of restoring such spur, the power of the commission to apportion costs is incidental to its power to require restoration of the spur[6] and cannot be exercised apart from the exercise of the primary power to order restoration.[7]

Operation and use. Under a statute authorizing a commission to require a railroad to provide a sidetrack, the commission cannot compel operation of the sidetrack.[8] Under a constitutional provision authorizing a public commission to compel a railroad to furnish switch connections, the commission cannot authorize one shipper to use existing spur tracks of a second shipper without consent of the latter.[9] However, under a statute requiring a person who builds a private sidetrack and secures a switch connection with a railroad to permit others to connect with such sidetrack or to use it on payment of a reasonable proportion of the cost of construction and maintenance, the commission may order the owner of the private sidetrack to allow its use by others even though the order would authorize a violation of the terms of a contract between the owner of the track and the persons seeking to use it.[10]

Rules, regulations, and orders of a board or commission relative to switches, spurs, and sidings must be reasonable and not arbitrary.

Rules, regulations, and orders of a board or commission relative to switches, spurs, and sidings must be reasonable and not arbitrary.[11] Particular orders held reasonable under prevailing conditions include orders authorizing[12] or compelling[13] a railroad to extend a spur track, not to discontinue existing facilities without consent of the board or commission,[14] to furnish a siding,[15] and to operate a sidetrack constructed by the shipper.[16] Particular orders held unreasonable under prevailing conditions include requirements compelling a railroad to construct a spur track within a period in-

Order held not discriminatory

Order of commission requiring railroad to maintain switch track serving five industries was not unconstitutional as discriminating against other industries in area which were required to maintain connecting spur tracks where spur tracks did not correspond to switch track, but to tracks leading to industries along switch track which were maintained by each industry respectively.—Alton R. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission ex rel. Moulding-Brownell Corp, 15 N.E.2d 508, 368 Ill 584, affirmed Alton R Co v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 59 S.Ct. 340, 305 U.S. 548, 83 L.Ed. 344.

sufficient to allow performance,[17] to construct a private spur for one shipper along the property of a different shipper,[18] or an extension of a spur to an adjoining landowner.[19]

Under statutes imposing an absolute duty on railroads to maintain and operate sidetracks, a commission cannot, in advance of a hearing, lay down a general rule as to what contracts relative to such sidetracks shall or shall not contain.[20]

Certificate. A statute requiring a certificate of necessity for the building of an extension does not make such certificate necessary for the building of a spur track,[21] and a refusal of the commission to grant a certificate for the building of an extension does not prevent it from requiring the building of a spur track.[22]

§ 413. —— Duty of Railroad

a. In general
b. Abandonment and restoration

a. In General

A railroad may have the duty to operate necessary switches, spurs, and sidings in accordance with the terms of constitutional and statutory provisions regulating the construction, maintenance, and operation of such facilities, but such duty is measured in extent and limits by the provisions imposing it.

A railroad may have the duty to operate necessary switches, spurs, and sidings in accordance with the terms of constitutional and statutory provisions regulating the construction, maintenance, and operation of such facilities.[23] Such duty, however, is measured in extent and limits by the statute imposing it,[24] and, accordingly, under a statute providing that every railroad shall construct, connect, maintain, and operate a reasonably adequate spur track whenever not necessarily exceeding three miles in length and when practically indispensable to an existing or proposed enterprise or industry, a railroad need not take over and operate an existing spur track where the element of indispensability is missing.[25] Under statutes requiring a railroad to construct and operate side tracks when reasonably necessary for established or prospective industries, and reasonably remunerative to the road, the railroad's duty to operate side tracks is subordinate to the paramount rights of the public,[26] and the police power of municipalities,[27] with respect to separation of street and railroad grades, as by depression of the railroad.[28] Under some statutes requiring railroads to furnish switch connections to a private track, the railroad need not carry freight over the privately owned portion of the track.[29]

Where a statute authorizes individuals to attach cars to the motive power of a state railroad, the right may be denied by the commissioners in charge of the road as to any car which has been condemned as unfit for service.[30] Under statutes requiring railroads to operate cars over switches, spurs, and sidings which it may own, control, or operate, it cannot be required to operate over tracks which it has no right to use,[31] or to operate in anticipation of prospective business.[32] Under a statute requiring railroads to operate over side tracks constructed by the shipper at his own expense, there is no duty to operate unless the track was so constructed,[33] or if it is in an unsafe condition.[34] Where the statute specifies the purposes for which operation may be compelled, there is no duty to operate for an unspecified purpose[35]

Rights and duties under contract. A private agreement as to operation between the owner of an industry who builds a connecting switch, and the railroad company, which in no way affects its use by the public, is valid and enforceable,[36] and the respective rights of shippers and railroads as to operation of private side tracks rest entirely on the contract made.[37] In other words, their rights will be determined by the particular contract provisions relative to the nature and extent of use.[38] The provisions of such a contract may be waived.[39] A stranger to the contract has no rights thereunder.[40]

A spur-track agreement between a railroad and a landowner, whereby the railroad retained ownership of the tracks and other movables is legal,[41] and under a provision whereby the railroad could take up the tracks and other movables, should the track be abandoned or its use discontinued for the business contemplated, the railroad has the right to remove the movables, when the property is sold under mortgage foreclosure,[42] notwithstanding the land belongs to another,[43] and such right may be asserted against one purchasing from the purchaser at the mortgage foreclosure sale.[44]

Public use. The term "railroad" includes all side tracks necessary or convenient for the transaction of the company's business, as discussed supra § 1, and if a railroad company controls and operates a switch or side track as a part of its system, although primarily for the benefit of a particular shipper, it may be compelled to transport freight for others at points along the line where such persons have a right to ship or receive it[45] A railroad cannot, however, be required to receive the freight of others on or along a private switch of which it has not the management or control,[46] except where it is otherwise provided by statute[47] Where a switch is constructed for the benefit of a particular shipper, on his land, and subsequently, under rights expressly reserved in the contract, the railroad company cancels its agreement and sells the switch to the landowner, he has the exclusive right to the use of the switch.[48] Where the right of public user exists, it is paramount to contrary contractual provisions.[49]

restore those abandoned; but it should give reasonable notice of removal of facilities previously furnished

In the absence of constitutional, statutory, or contract provisions providing otherwise, a railroad cannot be compelled to continue existing spur-track facilities[50] or to restore those abandoned.[51] The railroad should, however, give reasonable notice of removal of facilities previously furnished.[52] Nonpayment of demurrage is not a valid ground for discontinuance of switching services which the road is otherwise under a duty to continue.[53]

Railroad incidental to other business Where a company is chartered primarily for the conduct of a particular business with the incidental privilege of constructing a railroad for the transportation of its product, which, however, must also transport the produce of others at certain specified rates, the company may, in the absence of any provision to the contrary, discontinue the road whenever its own interests require it, and it is not obliged to continue its operation for the benefit of others.[54]

Under constitutional or statutory provisions. Where the duty to maintain and operate a private spur or siding, or switch connection therewith, is imposed by constitutional or statutory provisions, the railroad cannot lawfully discontinue it,[55] and if it has done so unlawfully, it may be compelled to restore such facilities.[56] Under statutes providing a complete system for the regulation and control of railroads by the commission, and expressly including spur or side tracks, a railroad cannot abandon an industrial spur track without permission of the commission,[57] and an order for continuance of the spur facilities may be valid despite financial loss resulting to the road from continued operation.[58]

(2) Under Contract

When a contract governing spur or side-track facilities specifies no particular time for continuance, the railroad may discontinue such facilities only where the public welfare so requires; but the railroad may discontinue facilities in accordance with contract provisions expressly giving it such right.

When a contract governing spur or sidetrack facilities specifies no particular time for continuance, it has been held that the railroad cannot discontinue such facilities in the absence of a controlling public necessity,[59] but it may do so at its election where public welfare so requires.[60] Aside from questions of public convenience, a railroad may be under a duty to continue facilities for a reasonable time where the spur or sidetrack was constructed at the shipper's expense.[61] The railroad may, of course, discontinue facilities in accordance with contract provisions expressly giving it such right.[62] Where continuance of private facilities would interfere with public rights, a contract for such continuance will not be enforced.[63]

A contract providing that a spur track shall be maintained as long as the business of the shipper is operated is not too indefinite to be enforced,[64] and will not be construed as void because contemplating interference with public interests through indefinite continuance.[65] Subject to the foregoing considerations, the rights of the parties as to continuance of such facilities will, in the last analysis, depend on the provisions of the particular contract involved.[66]

A stranger to the contract cannot take advantage of contract provisions to enforce restoration of an abandoned siding.[67]

Shipper's license to third party to use the private spur or siding is revocable.[68]

Operation at loss It has been held that, if a spur or switch track cannot be operated except at a loss, a contract not to remove it will not prevent its abandonment.[69]

§ 414. —— Cost of Furnishing and Charge for Use

Where such authority is conferred by statute, a railroad commission may determine who shall bear the cost of switches or side tracks. A shipper owning spur-track facilities cannot ordinarily charge the railroad for the latter's use of them.

Where such authority is conferred by statute, a railroad commission may determine who shall bear the cost of switches or side tracks.[70] So it may construe a contract between the railroad and shippers to determine the party liable for the cost of electrification of side tracks.[71] Under a statute providing that a railroad may require those to be served by an industrial spur track built by the railroad to pay the cost of acquiring rights of way and of construction, as may be determined by a commission in separate items, a railroad which has constructed such a spur cannot maintain an action for the cost prior to the specified determination of the commission.[72]

In the absence of fraud, a shipper who has contracted with a railroad to pay an estimated cost of construction of a spur track, and has paid it in advance, cannot recover from the railroad the difference between the estimated and the lower, actual cost;[73] and statutes empowering a shipper to build a spur and compel the railroad to connect by switch,[74] or under specified conditions to secure from the commission an order compelling the railroad to construct the spur at its real cost, to be charged to the shipper,[75] do not change this rule.

Charge for use. A shipper owning spur track facilities cannot ordinarily charge the railroad for the latter's use of them.[76] An owner of a plant has the absolute right to be served by an existing privately constructed spur track without paying for the right, where the owner had acquired the right to such service by deed, and payment for the right had been comprised in the consideration for the deed.[77]

§ 415. Elevators and Warehouses

The legislature cannot require a railroad company to permit a private person or corporation to erect a grain elevator or warehouse on its right of way; nor may such requirement be imposed by a railroad commission.

The legislature cannot require a railroad company to permit a private person or corporation to erect a grain elevator or warehouse on its right of way.[78] A statute authorizing a railroad commission to order a railroad to furnish sites along its right of way for private elevators or warehouses is void;[79] nor can railroad commissioners, under the powers vested in them to require the furnishing of adequate facilities, require a railroad company to furnish to a private individual a site on its right of way for the erection of a grain elevator,[80] even though the railroad company may previously have voluntarily granted such a privilege to some other individual, and the statutes prohibit any unjust discrimination.[81]

§ 416. Train Service and Accommodations

The requirements for adequate train service must be reasonable for public needs and not unduly burdensome to the railroad. Separate trains for freight and passengers should be run if there is a demand for each class of traffic and the business of the road is sufficiently large and profitable to warrant it.

must be reasonable for public needs and not unduly burdensome to the railroad.[82] Such requirements are subject to judicial determination.[83] The convenience and necessity which determine whether a railroad may abandon a specified service are those of the public and not of individuals.[84]

Mixed trains. As a general rule, a railroad does not discharge its duty to the public of furnishing transportation to passengers by the running of a mixed train consisting of freight and passenger cars,[85] and separate trains for freight and passengers should be run if there is a demand for each class of traffic and the business of the road is sufficiently large and profitable to warrant it.[86] On the other hand, where the business of the road is not sufficiently large and remunerative to require the operation of separate trains, mixed trains may be operated,[87] as where the loss involved in running separate trains is confiscatory.[88]

It has been held that no fixed rule can be applied in determining whether a railroad is entitled to discontinue passenger trains on certain lines and to substitute in lieu thereof mixed trains, and each case must be considered in the light of all the facts.[89] Under a statute providing that both a daily passenger and a daily freight train shall be run each way, excepting that if the road shall prove to a commission that the business on any line will not justify operation of separate trains, the road, on order of the commission, may run one mixed train each way, and the question of relief under the statutory exception should be decided on the basis of the revenues from the particular branch line involved and not from the whole road.[90] Under statutes requiring roads to run a "regular passenger train" every day each way over all lines, the words "regular passenger train" include a train composed of both passenger coaches and freight cars.[91]

§ 417. —— Regulation by State or Municipality

The state may regulate matters relating to train service and accommodations, but it must exercise its power within constitutional limitations, and its regulations must be reasonable and not arbitrary.

Under its power to regulate the operation of railroads, the state may regulate matters relating to train service and accommodations.[92] Thus, the state may designate the location of stations, as discussed supra § 57, the trains that shall stop thereat,[93] and the length of the stop;[94] facilities and accommodations on trains,[95] and may require passenger service between points within the state,[96] and separate trains for passengers and freight.[97] The validity of statutes requiring separate and equal passenger coach accommodations for white and colored persons has also been upheld.[98] The right of a municipality to regulate train service by ordinance may be abrogated by state statute.[99]

Exercise of power. The power of the state to control and regulate train service must be exercised within constitutional limitations[1] In the exercise of its power to regulate train service, the state cannot add provisions to contracts between railroads.[2] Statutes passed in the exercise of the state's power to regulate train service must be reasonable and not arbitrary,[3] and cannot compel service involving a loss on the whole road[4]

Particular statutes held valid include those requiring the running of passenger trains on Sunday[5] or restricting the running of freight trains on Sunday;[6] requiring all regular passenger trains to stop at all county seat stations on their route,[7] requiring fenders on cars of an interurban railroad,[8] requiring drinking water on passenger cars;[9] regulating the size and construction of cabooses;[10] requiring a heating apparatus so constructed that the fire will be extinguished if the car is overturned,[11] or prohibiting the heating of cars by a stove or furnace kept inside.[12]

Particular statutes held invalid include those arbitrarily requiring all passenger trains to stop at all stations where penitentiaries are located,[13] or at all county seats;[14] requiring a specified number of trains per day irrespective of loss;[15] or requiring a specified number of trains run to be stopped at stations with a specified number of inhabitants,[16] or making it mandatory for a commission to require railroads to stop all passenger trains at or near the state line[17]

Retroactivity

Where under statute authorizing discontinuance of any passenger train when it shall be made to appear that for a period of twelve months or more, the direct operating costs of such train have exceeded the aggregate gross revenues therefrom by more than a specified percentage, common carriers were privileged to avail themselves of statutory provisions immediately on passage of the statute, and reliance could be had on loss of revenue and cost of operation during the twelve months period next preceding passage of the statute, and such retroactivity did not render statute unconstitutional.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hammer, Tenn., 236 S.W.2d 971.

In making judicial determination of whether enforced continuance of statutory minimum train service would result in deprivation of property rights of railroad, nature of service that railroad had been and was performing, financial burden of continuing service, its effect on rights and reasonable needs of public to be served and operating features including earnings of railroad's entire system, and its duty to render commanded service, could be considered.—State v. management of the railroad[19] Generally, such a commission has authority to specify what type of service is required of a railroad company,[20] and is vested with wide discretion in requiring service of a railroad.[21]

Within the requirements of constitutional and statutory provisions, boards or commissions may not only have power to regulate train service, but may be under a positive duty to do so.[22] A statute making it mandatory for a commission to require the running of at least one daily passenger train over all lines of passenger roads has been declared inapplicable to a road having mere trackage rights over lines owned by a different road[23]

(2) Under Particular Statutory Provisions
(a) In general
(b) Discontinuance of service

(a) In General

The power to regulate train service with respect to coach screens, sleeping car service, and train stops may be derived from particular statutory provisions which may in some instances limit the power

Under statutes empowering a commission on finding that any service is inadequate to order a service that will be adequate, the commission may regulate passenger service[24] Under a statute providing that every railroad may be required by a board or commission to establish and maintain such suitable public service facilities as may be reasonable and just, it may require adequate facilities for transportation on both main and lateral lines.[25] A statute empowering the commission to require railroads to run at least one unmixed daily passenger train each way over their lines vests discretion in the commission with respect to prescribing what service shall be a sufficient discharge of a railroad's statutory duty to furnish passenger service[26]

Coach screens. Under statutes empowering a board or commission to compel the railroad to furnish a sufficient number of passenger cars comfortably to accommodate its passengers, it has no power to order the screening of passenger coaches as a health measure.[27]

Sleeping car service. Under statutes empowering a commission to regulate all matters with respect to the comfort or convenience of passengers, it has power to order sleeping car service.[28]

Train stops. Under statutes granting a commission general power as to regulation of service and specifically empowering the commission to order a railroad to increase the number of its trains, the commission may order specified trains to stop at a specified station,[29] but not when this would involve an unreasonable rerouting of the trains[30]

Action under repealed statute

Where the statute forbidding railroads from carrying baggage cars at the rear of passenger trains has been impliedly repealed by provisions with respect to the jurisdiction of public service commission to order stopped unsafe practices of railroads in the transportation of persons or property, commission's action in ordering a railroad to stop such practice under the prior statute without any finding as to whether the practice was safe or not, was unauthorized—Public Service Commission v. Missouri Pac. R Co, 197 S W 2d 665, 355 Mo. 679

Not limited by ordinances

Transit authority is not bound by terms of franchise ordinances of city and town dealing with electric train service, because of the fact that the authority acquired properties of original grantee under the ordinances—Lustfield v. Chicago Transit Authority, 97 N.E 2d 347, 408 Ill. 404.

30. U.S.—St Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, Mo, 41 S Ct 192, 254 U.S. 535, 65 L. Ed 389.

Under statutes empowering a commission to regulate time schedules of trains, it cannot require stoppage of trains at other than regular stations.[31] Under statutes empowering a commission to require a railroad to stop trains at regular stations or at other places within a city, it cannot compel a railroad to stop trains at points which are neither regular stations nor within a city.[32] Enactment of a statute requiring certain passenger trains to stop at all villages of a specified population does not deprive a board or commission of its power to regulate stopping of passenger trains at other places.[33]

(b) Discontinuance of Service

Under various constitutional or statutory provisions conferring regulatory powers on a commission, it may have power to determine whether a railroad should be permitted to discontinue train service and accommodations previously afforded by it, but under some statutes the commission is without power to permit discontinuance of service.

Under various constitutional or statutory provisions conferring regulatory powers on a commission, it may have power to determine whether a railroad should be permitted to discontinue train service and accommodations previously afforded by it,[34] and a railroad may not voluntarily abandon certain train service without securing the approval of the commission.[35] So under a statute granting a railway commission jurisdiction over the service, facilities, and equipment of all railroads, and empowering it to order such changes in, or additions to, them as may seem necessary to render them sufficient, efficient, and safe, the commission may make a general order requiring its permission to discontinue train service,[36] and under statutes giving a board or commission general power to require railroads to operate and to control all matters relating to operation and pertaining to the public good, the board or commission may require its written consent to discontinuance of regular intrastate passenger trains.[37]

Under general powers conferred by statute to adopt necessary rules and regulations governing train service and accommodations, the commission may promulgate rules requiring a railroad desiring to discontinue certain service to file a petition with the commission setting out necessary details and providing for a public hearing on such petition.[38] Under a statute forbidding discontinuance of train service without permission from a board or commission[39] or authorizing the commission to relax a requirement that the railroad maintain daily passenger service,[40] it has power to permit discontinuance; and the terms of the Broad police powers

When railroad seeks to discontinue operation of trains, power to determine whether operation of trains is reasonably necessary to serve the public adequately under the terms of franchise is conferred on the commission in the broad police powers contained in the constitution.—Lynchburg Traffic Bureau v. Commonwealth, 54 S.E.2d 66, 189 Va 612.

Where the public does not use the facilities furnished to a sufficient extent to compensate the company therefor, it is a matter for the commission to determine, after a hearing, whether or not more than a minimum of service should be supplied by the company.—Darby v Southern Ry. In New Jersey

(1) It was held that the board of public utility commissioners could not, by granting application for discontinuance or abandonment of passenger services because resulting in great loss to carrier while continuing freight services, waive railroad's cessation of carriage of passengers which breached carrier's statutory duty to carry both freight and passengers in consideration of franchise —O'Connor v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 29 A 2d 390, 129 N J.Law 263.

(2) In a later case, the decision of O'Connor v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, supra was expressly disapproved so far as it held that the board was without power to authorize discontinuance of train service not required by public convenience and necessity, and it was held that the board has the power and the duty, in a proper case, to authorize discontinuance of particular service no longer needed.—Pennsylvania-Reading Seashore Lines v Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 74 A 2d 265, 5 N J. 114, certiorari denied Brotherhood of R. 40. Tex.—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 200 S W 2d 626, 145 Tex 541.

The purpose of the statute requiring daily passenger service, Sundays excepted, but authorizing relaxation of such requirement by the railroad commission, is to avert imminent abandonment of railroads under authority of the interstate commerce commission and to preserve, for the communities affected, at least the advantage of a continued rail-freight transportation.—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, supra.

"Relaxation"

The meaning of the word "relaxation" must be gauged in light of the statute's legislative history, the circumstances obtaining at the time of its passage, and the evils it sought to statute may be such as to vest in the commission a discretion as to the degree of relaxation of the statutory requirement of train service required to stop an operating loss arising from the operation of unprofitable passenger train service.[41] The commission may be vested with discretionary power in acting on a railroad's application to discontinue passenger trains on branch lines and to substitute in lieu thereof mixed trains consisting of passenger cars and baggage cars on existing freight trains.[42]

Under other statutes, however, the commission is without power to permit discontinuance of railroad service,[43] at least where the service sought to be discontinued is one provided by charter provision.[44] So under a statute authorizing the commission, where service is inadequate, to fix and prescribe the service thereafter to be provided, the commission has no authority to authorize or permit abandonment of service,[45] but, if the cessation or curtailment of train service by the railroad is unreasonable, the commission has power to order the restoration thereof.[46] Under some provisions, the commission has no authority to require a railroad to obtain permission of the commission before discontinuing certain train service,[47] and, in the absence of a valid requirement imposed by law that the company obtain such permission, it need not do so before discontinuing passenger trains and substituting therefor mixed trains,[48] but the commission has authority in a judicial way, after a hearing, to require the railroad company to restore the passenger trains which it has discontinued, and to apply for a writ of mandamus to enforce such order.[49]

b. Exercise of Power

(1) In general
(2) Proceedings
(3) Matters affecting validity of regulation

(1) In General

Rules, regulations, and orders made by boards or commissions in the exercise of their power to regulate train service must be within the scope of the power conferred by the statute, and must be definite, certain, and reasonable.

Rules, regulations, and orders made by boards or commissions in the exercise of their power to regulate train service must be within the scope of the power conferred by the statute,[50] and must

Specified conditions

Under statute requiring daily passenger service, Sundays excepted, but authorizing relaxation of such requirement under three specified conditions, all three conditions need not exist before relief may be granted.—Railroad Commission of Tex. v. Jurisdiction

Where commission issued order which was duly served on railroad to appear and show cause, and offer testimony as to which passenger trains should not be continued on branch lines, and pursuant to such order railroad appeared, a hearing was duly had, and testimony was taken without objections on part of the state or protestants, and controversy was decided by commission as effectively as if railroad had instituted proceedings under statute, commission had jurisdiction to grant railroad relief notwithstanding railroad's failure to comply with statute.—In re Application of Union Pac. Operation of doubleheader trains

Under statutes authorizing railroad commission to regulate or prohibit use of doubleheader trains, but requiring commission's order to designate railroad or part of railroad on which such practice is forbidden or regulated, order prohibiting operation of doubleheader trains on any railroad in the state except on steep grades or where locomotive became temporarily disabled was invalid for want of authority.—Railroad Com-

be definite and certain.[51] It is also required that rules or orders regulating train service must be just and reasonable;[52] and the mere fact that the railroad is given an opportunity to be heard prior to the entry of the order is not sufficient to establish its validity in this respect.[53] An order respecting train service may be invalid without necessarily being also unconstitutional.[54]

Held reasonable. Rules, regulations, or orders held reasonable include requirements compelling a railroad to continue interurban service to serve people settling along the line in reliance upon continuance of such service,[55] to continue train service generally,[56] to maintain regular biweekly train service;[57] to stop trains with sleepers at stations lacking and requiring such service;[58] and to stop trains on signal at stations where they stopped occasionally[59] or at a junction point.[60] Other regulations have been held reasonable which require railroads to stop morning trains at a milk station;[61] to supply sanitary cups on trains where drinking water is furnished;[62] to stop additional trains at stations lacking adequate service,[63] to add trains on a line lacking adequate service;[64] and to run separate passenger and freight trains.[65]

Held unreasonable. Rules, regulations, or orders held unreasonable, in particular circumstances, include requirements compelling a railroad to stop additional trains at a station already having adequate service,[66] to continue the operation of certain trains,[67] to continue service by separate passenger and freight trains rather than by mixed trains;[68] to add new trains on a line already having a sufficient number,[69] to furnish drinking water on trains having a half hour run;[70] to attach sleepers to additional trains operating between cities already having adequate sleeper service;[71] to delay express trains an excessive time to accommodate locals;[72] and to rearrange train schedules contrary to convenience of general service so as

Finding not supported by evidence

Where a final order of the commission denying railroad permission to discontinue motor passenger trains is based on finding without support in evidence, the order is "unreasonable," "arbitrary" and reversible on appeal; commission did not show public "necessity" for the motor passenger trains in view of other available services of railroad and of other common carriers.—Application of Chicago, B. & Q. to afford a small place on a branch line better connections with the main line than its population justifies.[73]

Sunday service. An order requiring the maintenance of Sunday train service on a branch line may be unreasonable where such service could be afforded only at considerable net loss to the railroad.[74] An order requiring trains which are run on Sunday to stop at a specified station does not violate a statute forbidding the running of more than one train a day on Sunday.[75]

(2) Proceedings

Matters affecting the train service to be provided by a railroad must be presented to the commission for determination in an orderly way and in conformity with the commission's rules. The action of the commission is subject to review in the courts to determine whether it is lawful and reasonable under the evidence.

Matters affecting the train service to be provided by a railroad must be presented to the commission for determination in an orderly way and in conformity with the commission's rules.[76] Ordinarily, a proceeding before the commission is instituted by the filing of a petition by an interested party such as the railroad whose service is in question.[77] A railroad seeking to discontinue certain service must allege and prove by competent evidence sufficient facts which would justify abandonment thereof in the light of the public convenience and necessity;[78] and the burden rests on it to establish that public convenience and necessity do not warrant continuance of the service sought to be discontinued,[79] that such service is being furnished at a loss,[80] and that the proposed substitute for the service to be discontinued is adequate, efficient, just and reasonable.[81] The commission, before exercising its discretion in such matter, is bound to have a hearing on the merits of the case,[82] and such a hearing must be conducted fairly and expeditiously.[83]

An order of the commission denying permission to a railroad to discontinue the operation of certain trains is not a purely "administrative order" of the commission, but is "judicial" in character.[84] Severable requirements of a single order of the commission regulating service will be treated as separate orders if one is unreasonable or unjust.[85] An order requiring restoration of certain discontinued trains as a condition precedent to a hearing on the railroad's application to discontinue such trains has been held invalid where there was no public necessity for the restoration of the trains and their operation entailed substantial operating losses on the railroad.[86] The board or commission may have authority to grant a rehearing, notwithstanding a change in membership of the board, where the petition for rehearing was filed before conditions in the board's order had been fulfilled.[87]

Failure to take action

Where application of railroad for permission to discontinue passenger trains had been before the Alabama public service commission for some time without any action, action of the commission in declaring that it would not hear or consider the application until restoration of the trains irrespective of great loss to the railroad was invalid.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Alabama Public Service Commission, D.C.Ala., 88 F.Supp. 441, reversed on other grounds Alabama Public Service Commission v. Southern Ry. Co., 71 S.Ct. 775, 341 U.S. 341, 95 L.Ed. ——.

the action of the commission with respect to requiring a railroad to furnish certain train service or permitting the railroad to discontinue or change particular service is subject to review in the courts,[88] but the right to prosecute an appeal, and the requisite interest in the commission's order must be disclosed.[89] Ordinarily, the question for determination on such judicial review of the commission's order is whether such order is lawful and reasonable under the evidence.[90] In this respect, the order of the commission is presumed to be just, reasonable, and correct,[91] and the burden is on one appealing from the order of the commission to show that the order is unreasonable.[92] If there is any evidence reasonably tending to support the order, one attacking the order must establish its unreasonableness by evidence so strong and conclusive as to overcome all presumptions in its favor.[93] Moreover, the findings and order of the commission will not be disturbed unless it appears from the record that they are manifestly against the weight of the evidence and are so clearly unsupported by evidence as to show misapprehension or mistake, or willful disregard of duty.[94]

Federal or state courts

(1) It has been held that where adequate state court review of the commission's order based on predominantly local factors is available to the party objecting to such order, and the intervention of a federal court is not necessary for the protection of federal rights, the federal court, in its discretion, should decline jurisdiction of a suit brought to review the order and to obtain the extraordinary relief of an injunction, where the moving party did not first seek the remedy open to him in the state courts.—Alabama Public Service Commission v Southern Ry Co., Ala., 71 S.Ct. 775, 341 U.S. 363, 95 L.Ed. ——.—Alabama Public Service Commission v Southern Ry. Co., Ala., 71 S.Ct. 762, 341 U.S. 341, 95 L. Ed. ——, followed in Alabama Public Service Commission v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 71 S.Ct. 1012, 341 U.S. 943, 95 L.Ed. ——, and Alabama Public Service Commission v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 71 S.Ct. 1014, 341 U.S. 943, 95 L.Ed. ——.

(2) It was held, however, in an earlier case, that where there was no absolute right to a rehearing under state statute from order of state commission directing railroad company to operate one passenger train daily in each direction between certain points and procedures provided by the state statutes for review of the commission's order were judicial and not administrative remedies, railroad company could immediately seek relief from commission's order in the federal courts without first taking advantage of available state court remedies.—Ann Arbor R. Co v. Michigan Public Service Commission, D.C.Mich., 91 F.Supp. 668.

Jurisdiction of regulatory body

Where the division of public utilities of the state had no power to grant petition of trustees of two railroads to discontinue all passenger service on the lines of one of the railroads, the contention that the division had no jurisdiction over the subject matter of the case could properly be raised for the first time on appeal to the supreme court.—Trustees of New York, N.H. & H.R. Sufficiency of evidence

The only question for determination on appeal to the court from an order of the commission denying an application for permission to discontinue motor passenger trains is the sufficiency of evidence to prove that the order is not unreasonable or arbitrary.—Application of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 295 N.W. 389, 138 Neb. 767.

Particular matters considered

(1) In reviewing order of the commission denying application of railroad to discontinue passenger trains on branch line and to substitute in lieu thereof mixed trains consisting of a passenger car and a baggage car on its existing freight trains, it was necessary to consider whether operation of passenger trains at a loss justified discontinuance thereof when earnings of entire system reflected no deficit.—In re Application of Union Pac. R. Co. to Abandon Certain Train Service Between Cache Junction, Utah, and Preston, Idaho, and Between Ogden, Utah, and Malad, Idaho, 134 P.2d 1073, 64 Idaho 597.

(2) In determining whether commissioners would be enjoined from enforcing order requiring railroad to continue operation of certain trains, the court would consider whether the public interest demanded a continuance of the operation of the trains.—Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. Board of Railroad Com'rs of State of Montana, D.C.Mont., 28 F. Supp. 810.

(3) General allegations in petition to commission for rehearing, by those opposing application of railroad to discontinue operation of passenger train, that order of the commission was unreasonable and unlawful were insufficient to authorize court on appeal to consider contention that order of commission was contrary to a prior order and was based on the same facts and therefore contrary to law.—Granite City v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 95 N.E.2d 371, 407 Ill. 245

Where proofs support the findings of the commission with respect to discontinuance by a railroad of a passenger service which was little used, those findings cannot be disturbed in the court.—O'Connor v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 24 A.2d 411, 128 N.J.Law 35, reversed on other grounds 29 A.2d 390, 129 N.J.Law 263.

As a general rule, the court reviewing the order of the commission must weigh the evidence, review the entire record and base its decision on all facts to be gleaned from the record, and it is not limited to a consideration of whether the record discloses any evidence to sustain the order[95] In some proceedings, the court may receive and consider evidence other than that offered before the commission,[96] and it may try the case de novo, exercising its own independent judgment as to both the law and the facts on the evidence presented to, and the record made before, such court[97]

Where it appears from the evidence that the order of the commission is unlawful or unreasonable, it may be set aside,[98] or its enforcement enjoined,[99] but, in the absence of abuse of its powers by the commission, a court is not justified in setting aside the order of the commission,[1] as where the evidence is insufficient to justify judicial interference therewith.[2] Where the court has set aside an order of the commission denying the application of a railroad for leave to discontinue certain service on the ground that such service was unprofitable, the commission has continuing jurisdiction to require, if warranted by the facts, a resumption of the service whenever it appears that the service is needed and may be rendered at a profit.[3]

(3) Matters Affecting Validity of Regulation

A board or commission in deciding what train service shall be provided by a railroad must be guided in its determination by the public convenience and necessity in relation to such service, and where it is sought to discontinue certain service, the controlling criteria are the character and population of the territory served, public patronage or lack thereof, the remaining transportation facilities, the expense of operation as compared with the revenue therefrom, and the financial condition of the railroad as a whole.

As a general rule, a board or commission in deciding what train service shall be provided by a

Relevancy of evidence before commission

Finding unsupported by evidence

Where a final order of the commission denying railroad permission to discontinue motor passenger trains is based on finding without support in evidence, the order is "unreasonable," "arbitrary" and reversible on appeal.—Application of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 295 N.W. 389, 138 Neb. 767.

Scope of decree

Where public convenience and necessity did not require a continuation of two daily intra-state passenger trains serving two communities, a decree would be entered granting railroad permission to discontinue operation of such trains but without prejudice to further consideration by commission, if requested, as to whether public convenience would be served by additional bus passenger transportation facilities, furnished by railroad.—Chicago & N. Sufficiency of evidence

(1) In suit by railroad to enjoin commission and other state officials from proceeding against plaintiff by reason of its failure to restore operation of certain passenger trains, evidence established that plaintiff would suffer irreparable damage unless court permanently enjoined defendants from imposing sanctions.—Louisville & N. Public necessity and convenience

Where commission determined on substantial evidence that public necessity and convenience required continued operation of trains, the court had no power to interfere with such determination.—New York Cent. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 103 N.Y.S.2d 217, 278 App.Div. 725.

railroad must be guided in its determination by the public convenience and necessity in relation to such service.[4] Whether public convenience and necessity require a given service to be performed or dispensed with is a question to be determined by a separate consideration of the facts in each case, the doctrine of convenience and necessity being a relative or elastic theory rather than an abstract or absolute rule.[5] The controlling criteria with respect to whether a railroad may discontinue certain service are the character and population of the territory served thereby, public patronage or lack thereof, the remaining transportation facilities, the expense of operation as compared with the revenue therefrom, and the financial condition of the railroad as a whole,[6] but any alleged inconvenience to the public with respect to the collection, transportation, or delivery of the United States mail is not a material consideration.[7]

It follows that the expense of the particular train service and the loss resulting therefrom are an important element which may and should be considered by the commission,[8] and the commission's order to furnish service, or refusal of permission

Particular matters to be considered

(1) On application by railroad to abandon passenger service on branch line and to substitute in lieu thereof mixed trains consisting of passenger and baggage cars on existing freight trains, it was necessary to consider limited public use of passenger service, expense and net loss to railroad in operation of passenger trains, available passenger service furnished by another railroad paralleling the railroad on which passenger trains were sought to be discontinued, bus service, and paved highways—In re Application of Union Pac. R Co. to Abandon Certain Train Service Between Cache Junction, Utah, and Preston, Idaho, and Between Ogden, Utah, and Malad, Idaho, 134 P.2d 1073, 64 Idaho 597.

(2) The commission was justified and had the duty to consider the inconvenience the public would suffer by reason of change in service by transmitting mail, express, and baggage, as well as passengers on the same train.—In re Application of Union Pac. R. Co. to Abandon Certain Train Service Between Cache Junction, Utah, and Preston, Idaho, and Between Ogden, Utah, and Malad, Idaho, supra.

(3) The loss of railroad transportation because of operation of motor vehicles on highways constructed and improved at public expense may properly be considered on a contested application to discontinue motor passenger trains operated at a loss on a branch line of railroad.—Application of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 41 N W.2d 157, 152 Neb. 352—Application of Chicago, B & Q R Co, 295 N.W. 389, 138 Neb 767.

Proposed substitute service

Neb—Application of Chicago, B & Q R. Co., 41 N W 2d 157, 152 Neb 352.

Duty to postal department

The alleged fact that mail service of communities located on branch lines of railroad would be adversely affected by discontinuance of passenger service on the lines and substitution of mixed train service, in connection with freight service provided, would not require denial of application for authority to make the change in service, since arrangement for carrying and distribution of mail is solely the province of United States postal department, and any duty owed by railroad with respect to carriage of mail was a duty to the postal department, and not to the public—Union Pac. R. Co v Public Service Commission, 132 P.2d 128, 102 Utah 465.

Finding otherwise justified

The fact, however, that the commission considered public inconvenience which would result with respect to mail service on a discontinuance of trains, although commission had no control over the mail, was not error where finding was also justified with respect to inconvenience in the handling of baggage and milk.—Gardner v Commerce Commission, 79 N E.2d 71, 400 Ill. 123.

Actual loss in dollars and not book loss, unless book loss reflects actual loss, must be considered in determining application to discontinue railroad service —New York Cent R Co. v Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, 195 N E 566, 129 Ohio St 381.

On question of economic waste raised in petition of railroad for leave to abandon passenger service on a branch line, disposition of case does not necessarily depend on use of a formula, but evidence presented by railroad cost accountants, although consisting of various formulas, is to be heard by commission along with other evidence —Gardner v Commerce Commission, 79 N E 2d 71, 400 Ill. 123.

Period of time involved

Where conditions of railroad transportation had changed since 1886 when branch line was constructed and during years 1937, 1938, and 1939 motor passenger trains were operated at a loss, the revenues during entire period of operation of branch line were not proper measures of earnings and expenses for purpose of determining railroad's application to discontinue motor passenger trains, earnings and expenses since 1932 were not proper measure of present or future profits and losses since railroad was required to reckon with conditions resulting in present losses.—Application of Chicago, B. & Q R. Co, 295 N W. 389, 138 Neb. 767.

Consideration by court

In determining whether decision of commission in denying application to change type of service provided by railroad can be justified under any reasonable view of the evidence, the court will consider question of relationship between cost of rendering the service and revenue received therefrom, and question of what constitutes reasonable service to the public.—Union Pac. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 132 P.2d 128, 102 Utah 465.

Evidence

(1) Evidence established that order of commission requiring railroad to continue daily operation of two intra-state trains between two communities was unreasonable and confiscatory and economic loss resulting from railroad's operation of such trains overbalanced whatever convenience public derived from those trains —Chicago & N W Ry Co v Michigan Public Service Commission, 45 N W.2d 520, 329 Mich. 432

(2) Evidence established that there was no public necessity for passenger trains ordered restored by commission between certain points because the communities involved had a system of improved highways with much motor vehicle transportation.—Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, D.C. Ill., 82 F.Supp. 368.

(3) Where some inconvenience would result to small number of public by discontinuance of service on branch line of railroad, but other services existent and prospective could handle all the business handled by the railroad with comparatively little extra trouble and additional expense to the public, evidence sustained implied finding that loss in revenue by continuance of service on branch line overbalanced inconvenience to the public from discontinuance thereof, and that it was unreasonable for commission to deny an application of railroad to discontinue branch line service —Corporation Commission v. Southern Pac Co., 99 P.2d 702, 55 Ariz 173.

Pending hearing

An order of commission compelling the restoration of passenger trains operated at a substantial loss pending a hearing on the railroad's application to discontinue the trains was invalid as not only compelling the doing of an idle act for purpose of inflicting irreparable injury on the railroad but as involving an injury to the larger public interest and a disregard of the railroad policy of economy laid down in the Transportation Act —Chicago, B & Q R Co. v Illinois Commerce Commission, D C Ill, 82 F Supp 368

Restoration of trains

An interstate railroad could not be compelled to restore local passenger trains operated between local points whose operation entailed substantial operating losses notwithstanding railroad's system-wide railroad earnings were sufficient to have absorbed the loss where there was no public necessity for the restoration of the trains —Chicago, B & Q R Co v. Illinois Commerce Commission, D C. Ill, 82 F Supp 368.

Finding sustained by evidence

(1) On application by railroad to discontinue operation of a passenger train, evidence sustained finding of the commission on which order authorizing discontinuance was based. —Granite City v. Illinois Commerce

ute, the consideration of loss to the railroad resulting from certain train service is conclusive with respect to the right of the railroad to discontinue such service,[12] and in such case consideration of public convenience or necessity is not required,[13] and the commission has no alternative other than to authorize discontinuance of train service when the railroad establishes such a loss as brings it within the provisions of the statute.[14]

Ordinarily, however, the question of expense or loss is not necessarily conclusive,[15] and it must be considered in the light of the public need for the service which is an element that should receive paramount consideration.[16] Accordingly, an order for adequate train service may be reasonable even though it entails some pecuniary loss in relation to the service ordered,[17] and an order permitting discontinuance of service shown to be

Profitable line

Motor passenger trains operated on a branch line of a railroad at a substantial loss may properly be discontinued by the commission, where adequate public transportation is otherwise furnished, although both such branch line and main line are operated at a profit—Application of Chicago, B. & Q. Mandatory provision

The statute providing that on application by carrier, the commission "shall" authorize the discontinuance of any passenger train when it shall be made to appear that for a period of twelve months or more, the direct operating cost of such train has exceeded the aggregate gross revenues therefrom by more than a specified percentage should be construed as being mandatory, and not as directory, in so far as commission is concerned; the fact that the statute was intended to be mandatory carried with it the implication that common carriers were privileged to avail themselves of the statutory provisions immediately on passage of the statute and reliance could be had on loss of revenue and cost of operation during the twelve months period next preceding passage of the statute.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hammer, Tenn., 236 S.W.2d 971.

Evidence sustained railroad's burden of proving that with passenger traffic between certain points, offered and reasonably to be expected, operation of daily passenger train between such points did not and would not pay cost of service plus a reasonable return on property employed in rendering service, so as to entitle railroad to permission to discontinue daily service.—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Texas, Tex.Civ.App., 220 S.W.2d 273, error refused.

Necessity of expenditures

Railroad management has a duty to its stock and bondholders as well as a duty to the public, and would not be compelled to spend large sums of money for such things as advertising, air-conditioned cars, and better equipment in general, in proving, what it already knew, that daily passenger service between specified points in state did not and could not be made to pay, in order to be entitled under statute to permission to discontinue daily passenger service between the specified points on ground that it did not and could not be made to pay—Texas & N. Where method of accounting used by railroad seeking permission to discontinue certain passenger trains under statute authorizing such discontinuance on proof that direct operating costs of trains have exceeded the aggregate gross revenues therefrom by more than a specified percentage was entirely proper and one that was recognized by other major railroad companies, and showed a deficit far in excess of statutory requirement, commission was required to grant railroad's petition for permission to discontinue the trains.—Louisville & N. Loss caused by inadequate service

A railroad which allows its equipment to become so depleted and its schedules on its branch lines to be so irregular as to make use of its facilities uncomfortable and distasteful, which causes public to seek other modes of travel, is not giving service to the public under the rule of convenience and necessity, and railroad cannot justify an abandonment by using as a factor the loss of business caused by reason of such inadequate service—Gardner v. Commerce Commission, 79 N.E.2d 71, 400 Ill. 123.

Increase of rates as remedy

In proceeding by railroad to discontinue daily train service and substitute tri-weekly service, where railroad was losing profits from operation due to increased cost, and not to decrease of patronage in service, amount of return was not controlling, and remedy of railroad to recoup its diminishing returns from service on that branch was more directly in field of an increased rate structure rather than reduction of service—Alabama Public Service Commission v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 45 So.2d 449, 253 Ala. 559.

16. Ohio—Village of Millersburg v. Public Utilities Commission, 27 N.E.2d 1020, 137 Ohio St. 75.

Requirements of population

In determining whether public convenience and necessity required continuation of daily passenger service provided by two intra-state trains, consideration was required to be given to requirements of population of cities, villages and territories served, as well as to financial loss sustained by railroad in operating such trains—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Michigan Public Service Commission, 45 N.W.2d 520, 329 Mich. 432.

needed by the public may be unreasonable notwithstanding loss resulting from the operation of such service.[18] The earnings of the entire system of the railroad may be considered by the commission as a factor in weighing the question of public necessity and convenience,[19] and, where the operation of the entire system of the railroad yields a net profit, the loss resulting from the maintenance of a certain service must be of sufficient importance to outweigh the inconvenience which the public will suffer as a result of its discontinuance in order to justify the discontinuance of that service.[20] Under some statutes, the commission may relax a requirement that the railroad furnish certain train service, where it is not necessary in the rendition of adequate service to the public, whether or not such train service is being furnished at a loss.[21] Where the duty of a railroad to maintain daily railroad service is not imperative under statute, but is relative, the railroad, in order to obtain a reduction in service is not required to show that the rate of return on the system requires a reduction of service or that it would impede interstate commerce, but that the reduced plan would supply public necessities.[22]

A railroad's income from sources other than its own railroad operations should not be taken into account in considering the confiscatory effect of an order of the commission requiring the continued operation of certain trains.[23] A particular year which is not typical in railroad operation should not be used as a standard by which to gauge the amount of traffic necessary to retain service.[24] The cost of operation should not be figured merely on the basis of immediate cash outlay.[25] In determining expenses relative to a branch line, an apportionment of expenses between the branch and main lines is proper,[26] and claims for damages may be included in the apportionment.[27]

§ 419. —— Duty of Railroad in General

A railroad company must provide such train service and accommodations as will meet the necessities of the general public, and not serve merely private interests; but the extent of the duty to furnish train service varies as the exigencies of the traffic and its remunerative character demand and justify, and ordinarily rests in the sound discretion of the railroad.

A railroad company authorized to condemn land and act as a common carrier must provide such train service and accommodations as will meet the necessities of the general public,[28] and not serve

Imperative duty

The duty to furnish reasonably adequate train service to local communities served by railroad is essentially among the imperative duties that are by law imposed on railroads in consideration of privileges conferred on them by state for benefit of public —State v Georgia Southern & F Ry Co, 190 So. 527, 139 Fla. 115, 123 A L.R. 914.

merely private interests.[29] Fulfillment of its duty, of course, requires the furnishing of suitable cars and locomotives.[30] Apart from contract,[31] a railroad is under no duty to supply train service for individual interests,[32] although it may do so within limitations not adversely affecting its public duties.[33]

The extent of a railroad's duty to furnish train service varies as the exigencies of the traffic and its remunerative character demand and justify,[34] and ordinarily rests in the sound discretion of the railroad.[35] A railroad may, if it so chooses, and no statutory or constitutional inhibitions exist, exercise only those provisions of its charter permitting carriage of passengers.[36] It has been held, however, that where a railroad corporation is authorized by its charter and the underlying statute to carry both passengers and property, it is under a duty to carry freight as well as passengers where public convenience so requires,[37] and that the fact that it was granted a certificate of convenience and necessity on testimony concerning merely the carriage of passengers does not affect such duty.[38] If the duty to run trains between designated points exists, the road will not be excused from performance of its duty by the fact that there are other and inadequate transport facilities between the same points.[39]

Train service, once established, should not be discontinued unless and until some good and sufficient reason is shown therefor,[40] and a railroad may not at will abandon lines or trains or even particular types of service that railroads customarily perform.[41] The fact that a train served only employees of an industry working at a particular place did not preclude the service from being a "public service" so as to authorize the railroad to discontinue the train on the ground that the train did not serve the general public, where the train had been operated for a long period of years under a public franchise.[42] On the other hand, a railroad is not required to continue offering service to the public which the public would not use, where the offer is a financial burden and demanding its continuance is unreasonable,[43] and, under

Extent of "absolute duty"

With respect to right of railway company to discontinue operation of two trains, the operation of which was allegedly in excess of company's absolute duty and resulted in annual loss to company, the "absolute duty" of company required only that reasonably adequate mail and express facilities along the line of road in question be furnished.—Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co. v. State, 119 P.2d 835, 189 Okl. 685.

A proviso or obligation, imposed on railroad by franchise and legislative act that railroad should maintain a railroad of the first class along route equipped with ample accommodations for all passenger travel and freight transportation, is relative and subject to the criterion of whether public convenience and necessity demands continued operation of passenger trains which railroad sought to discontinue on such route. —Lynchburg Traffic Bureau v. Consideration of public

In determining the necessity for continued operation of motor passenger trains on branch line of railroad, consideration should be given to the public rather than to individuals.—Application of Chicago, B & Q. R Co., 295 N.W. 389, 138 Neb 767.

Only service on particular line

When particular railroad service sought to be discontinued is only service along particular line serving number of communities, discontinuance should not be authorized unless reasonable, in view of public welfare and cost of operating service.—New York Cent. A railroad company, under charter, cannot abandon its service in part and continue to exercise its charter rights in other respects, but it is bound to serve public adequately as long as it continues to function as a corporation under its charter, but it has not violated its charter if it furnishes adequate and reasonable service.—Darby v. some statutes, a railroad has the right to discontinue train service between certain points when the traffic does not pay the cost of service plus a reasonable return, without consideration of public convenience or necessity[44] In considering the question whether a railroad is obliged to continue the furnishing of certain train service, the entire revenues of the system are to be taken into account, and not merely the direct return of the service sought to be discontinued,[45] but the fact that the entire system operates at a profit is not conclusive of the railroad's duty to furnish service,[46] and particular train service operated at a loss may properly be discontinued where adequate transportation is otherwise furnished although the entire system operates at a profit[47]

Governmental regulations as to train service must be obeyed[48] Under a statute empowering a board or commission to authorize a railroad, under specified conditions, entirely to discontinue particular intra-state passenger service, there is no implied necessity for a railroad to secure permission of the board or commission before merely changing its train schedule.[49] A railroad's statutory duty to maintain appropriate train service to meet public needs must be performed, even though its cost exceeds the receipts from rendering the particular service, when the burden of such service does not unduly impair the total revenue receipts of the railroad from all sources on its entire system.[50]

§ 420. —— Number of Trains, Cars, and Engines

Subject to proper regulation, the number of cars and engines or trains to be used rests primarily in the discretion of the operating railroad. A road may be obligated under statutory or charter provisions to run trains on Sunday.

Unnecessary and useless expenditures

If passenger service furnished by railroad is in all respects adequate, efficient, just and reasonable as required by statute, it is neither just nor reasonable to impose an unreasonable and unjust economic loss on the railroad, and, indirectly, on the public, to require unnecessary and useless expenditures —In re Application of Union Pac. R. Co. to Abandon Certain Train Service Between Cache Junction, Utah, and Preston, Idaho, and Between Ogden, Utah, and Malad, Idaho, 134 P.2d 1073, 64 Idaho 597.

What receipts considered

In determining whether primary duty of railroad to render minimum statutory train service would be so burdensome, if continued, as to warrant proposed reduction in local service, receipts from interstate freight, passenger and other service over railroad's line and from through interstate passenger train service operating over railroad's line could be considered.—State v. Georgia Southern & F. Ry. Co., 190 So. 527, 139 Fla. 115, 123 A.L.R. 914.

Statute held valid

The Constitution in declaring railroads to be public highways and railroad companies to be common carriers does not preclude enactment of a statute contrary to common-law rule, which required railroad to furnish adequate service, under which statute railroad could discontinue daily passenger service between intra-state points when traffic did not and would not pay cost of service plus reasonable return, without consideration of public convenience or necessity —Texas & N. O R. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Texas, supra.

Mere inconvenience to public

In determining the financial loss of railway company as warranting discontinuance of operation of certain trains, where decreased facilities would afford same essential service as presently performed with mere inconvenience resulting to the public, the inquiry should be limited to the revenue and expense arising from the particular service sought to be discontinued and company should not be required to show financial loss after considering all revenues from entire system.—Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co. v. State, 119 P 2d 835, 189 Okl 685

Carriage of both freight and passengers

N.J —O'Connor v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 29 A 2d 390, 129 N J.Law 263.

Contractual obligation

Where, in accepting and operating line of railroad in state, railway obligated itself not to be relieved from any of duties or burdens placed on it by laws of state, the obligation was contractual in nature and extended to the statutory duty relative to train service —State v. Georgia Southern & F. Ry. Co., 190 So. 527, 139 Fla. 115, 123 A.L.R. 914.

Service rendered at loss

The service of one mixed passenger and freight train each way every day except Sundays is imperative statutory duty which should be rendered by railroad in interest of public necessity for adequate local service, even though particular service is rendered at relatively small financial loss when railroad's entire system has substantial net earnings over all operating expenses, and loss in rendering particular local service is not so out of proportion to reasonable public necessities as to operate as an unlawful deprivation of property rights of railroad.—State v. Georgia Southern & F. Ry Co., supra.

417, 418, the number of cars and engines[51] or trains[52] to be used rests primarily in the discretion of the operating railroad. Whether the number of cars, engines, and trains is sufficient or insufficient will depend on the relative public necessity and expense of operation.[53] So, where a railroad seeks to reduce the number of daily trains operated on its line, each case must be determined by a fair consideration of all the pertinent facts affecting the rights of the public, the duty of the carrier, the burden to it, and the reasonable needs of the public.[54] The number of trains required to be operated by a railroad may, however, be fixed by its charter,[55] and, where the charter requires the railroad to run "at least" one daily train in each direction, the fact that such requirement is not adapted to existing conditions does not authorize disuse of the formula since its wisdom is not a legal issue.[56]

Particular statutory provisions. Under a statute requiring operation of one train a day each way over all lines exceeding five miles in length, the distance between scheduled stopping places is the rule of measurement to be applied.[57] It has been held that operation of a through train not stopping at way stations is insufficient compliance with such a statute.[58] Under a state statute prohibiting a railroad from abandoning any portion of its service to the public unless and until it shall first have obtained from a state board or commission a permit allowing such abandonment, a railroad should apply to the state board or commission for such permit before discontinuing interstate trains rendering intra-state service.[59]

Sunday trains. A road may be obligated under statutory[60] or charter[61] provisions to run trains on Sunday. Under a statute requiring every railroad to run at least one passenger train each way over all lines "every day," the phrase "every day" includes Sundays as well as week days.[62] Under a statute requiring railroads to operate regular passenger trains on Sunday, it has been held that a road is not under a duty to do so where, without its fault, the roadbed is unsafe for use by regular passenger trains.[63]

§ 421. —— Stopping at Stations or Other Places

A railroad company is bound on common-law principles to stop a sufficient number of its trains at stations to meet the demands of public convenience and business necessity, and, under statutory provisions designating places at which trains shall stop, the duty of the road to stop trains at places so designated is mandatory; but within such limitations imposed by law, a railroad may, in its discretion, control by reasonable regulations the stations or other places at which particular trains shall stop.

the stations[66] or other places[67] at which particular trains shall stop. It must, however, stop trains at stations scheduled for their stoppage,[68] or on flag at nonscheduled stations reasonably requiring such service.[69] The time of stoppage should be of reasonable duration,[70] or, where the matter is regulated by statute, for the time therein specified.[71]

Particular statutory provisions. A statute providing that every railroad shall furnish sufficient accommodations for the transportation of all persons and property offered at any established station, siding, or stopping place, and shall take and transport and discharge passengers at, from, and to such places, requires railroads to stop cars at established places,[72] but does not require the road to stop cars at any particular and nonestablished place.[73] Statutory provisions relative to the number of passenger trains a day to be stopped at stations of a specified character have been construed as not including mixed trains.[74]

Repealed statutes. Where a statute requiring trains to stop at designated stations has been followed by a later enactment leaving the matter of train stops to the discretion of a board or commission, there is no duty to obey the train stop provisions of the first statute,[75] since the later has impliedly repealed the earlier.[76]

§ 422. —— Accommodations on Trains

A railroad must provide its trains with such accommodations and facilities as are reasonably necessary under prevailing conditions.

Both under its common-law duty and under some governmental regulations, a railroad must provide its trains with such accommodations and facilities as are reasonably necessary under prevailing conditions,[77] such as drinking water,[78] food,[79] seats, as discussed in Carriers § 645, heat[80] safe heating arrangements,[81] light,[82] and toilets.[83] A railroad making suitable provisions for day coach passengers on other trains may run all-Pullman trains from which passengers lacking such accommodations are excluded.[84]

§ 423. —— Separate Accommodations for Races

Compliance must be had with statutes requiring a railroad to furnish separate accommodations for the white and colored races on passenger trains, and the duty exists to provide the separate accommodations irrespective of whether or not persons of both races are in fact present on a train, and despite difficulties of compliance arising from press of business.

A railroad company must comply with statutes requiring it to furnish separate accommodations for the white and colored races on passenger trains.[85] Such statutes are ordinarily construed as imposing the duty to provide the separate accommodations irrespective of whether or not persons of both races are in fact present on a train,[86] and despite difficulties of compliance arising from press of business.[87] Such statutes are for the protection of those who are to receive the accommodations,[88] and when an employee of the railroad is himself receiving the accommodations, he is as much within the statute and its purposes as if he were during that time a passenger.[89] In other words, the statute applies without regard to whether those receiving the accommodations while riding on the train are passengers or employees of different races.[90] The term "accommodations" in the statute is used in the same sense as is understood by its analogous use in connection with accommodations at hotels or inns.[91]

Character of railroad and train. Under a statute requiring every railroad operating passenger cars or coaches over a track or line within the state to provide separate and equal coach accommodations for white and colored persons, an interstate train doing any intra-state business is within the requirement.[92] Under a separate coach statute providing that the separation requirement shall not apply to transportation of passengers carried in a caboose car attached to a freight train, a mixed freight and passenger train is without the exception and subject to the separation requirements.[93] Where, however, passengers are in fact carried in a caboose car attached to a freight train, there is no duty to separate the races,[94] even though no other train is provided for passenger carriage.[95]

Character of accommodations. Under some statutes requiring separate accommodations for the white and colored races, the character of the accommodations must be equal,[96] but it has been held that identical accommodations need not be provided in order to secure equality.[97]

Pullmans Under a statute requiring every railroad operating railroad cars or coaches on a line within the state to provide separate and equal accommodations for white and colored people, it has been held that a railroad fulfills its duty by furnishing separate day coaches and is not liable for penalty because a sleeper owned and operated by the Pullman Company and attached to its train lacks separate compartments for the different races.[98]

Posting sign. Under a separate coach statute requiring railroads to furnish separate coaches for white and colored passengers and to post in a conspicuous place a sign indicating the race for which designated, the railroad does not fulfill its duty by merely furnishing separate coaches without posting a sign in a conspicuous place.[99]

§ 424. Operating Equipment

The state, or a duly authorized board or commission, may regulate the operating equipment of a railroad; but such regulations should be certain and definite.

Under its power to regulate the operation of railroads, a state or a board or commission, under authority delegated to it, may regulate the operating equipment of railroad rolling stock;[1] and a railroad's violation of an order of a commission prescribing such equipment may constitute negligence per se.[2] Under statutes conferring on a board or commission general powers relative to regulation of rates, service, and discrimination, it cannot regulate operating equipment.[3] Under a statute authorizing a board or commission to require cab curtains for locomotives, it has implied power to prescribe the general specifications of the curtains.[4]

Push cars. The mere fact that a statute requiring clearance before moving trains or speeders on a logging railroad's right of way is silent as to push cars cannot be construed as a complete inhibition against the use of push cars on such railroads.[6]

§ 425. —— Federal Safety Appliance Act

a. In general
b. Automatic coupling
c. Brakes
d. Repair of defective cars

a. In General

The Federal Safety Appliance Act imposes an absolute duty on railroads to equip their cars properly; and the act, being remedial, is liberally construed to accomplish its intent.

The federal statutes and amendments known as the Safety Appliance Act were designed to protect the lives and safety of trainmen and travelers[7] and impose on railroads subject to the act the duty to equip cars properly.[8] The validity of this act has been upheld[9] notwithstanding it imposes an absolute duty of compliance[10] Rules adopted by the interstate commerce commission in the exercise of its authority under the act to set standards of equipment are an integral part of the act and have the force of statute.[11] The act is remedial,[12] and its provisions, as well as orders of the interstate commerce commission promulgated thereunder, should be construed liberally[13] and in such manner as to give effect to the intention of the act.[14]

The duty of a railroad to observe the requirements of the Federal Safety Appliance Act has been variously stated to be absolute,[15] imperative,[16] positive,[17] mandatory,[18] unqualified,[19] and unconditional.[20] The courts should not countenance the interpolation of exceptions not contained in the act,[21] or be moved by considerations of convenience or practicability to whittle away and eventually nullify the protection afforded thereby;[22] they should not by their decisions enable railroads to eliminate safety appliances where hazards exist to some substantial degree and where the use of such appliances would insure increased protection.[23]

Considerations of convenience, utility, or added expense caused in the handling of the railroad's business by complying with the act cannot change the application of the act to situations falling within it.[24] The carrier is not excused from compliance therewith by any showing of care, however assiduous,[25] nor can the obligation of the railroad under the act be contracted away,[26] as, for example, by the intricacies of an operating contract.[27] A custom of the railroads cannot justify a violation of the act,[28] although such custom, where it has the acquiescence of the interstate commerce commission, is persuasive of the meaning of the act.[29] The act is applicable to a railroad operated as a common carrier in interstate commerce by a state, notwithstanding the act does not specifically mention state-owned railroads.[30] In determining whether a railroad is subject to the provisions of the act, the method of fixing the charge is unimportant where the service involves the transportation of cars and their contents.[31]

Locomotive or tender as "car." Whether or not the word "car" includes locomotives in a particular provision of the act is a matter of congressional intent.[32] Generally, locomotives and tenders are included within the term "cars" in those cases where the act or an order of the interstate commerce commission is such that, as applied to the appliance and the equipment, no sufficient practical distinction can be made between cars and locomotives;[33] in other words, where the same reasons for requiring the installation and maintenance of the appliance on an engine or a tender exist as for requiring it on a car, and there is no separate provision with respect to the equipment required on the locomotive, then the locomotive is construed to be a car.[34] However, a locomotive and a car are not the same for all the purposes of the act.[35]

Defective cars and engines. Defective car provisions of the Safety Appliance Act apply to empty cars,[36] to foreign cars,[37] and to car movements as well as to train movements.[38] Under the statutory provision forbidding a railroad to haul, use, or permit to be used, a defective car, on its lines, a railroad is liable for permitting the hauling of defective cars over its road by an independent contractor,[39] for hauling a car received from another road in a defective condition,[40] or for hauling its own defective cars over the lines of another railroad.[41] The provision applies to cars which are "used" without being "hauled,"[42] and to cars loaded with materials or property belonging to the railroad company for which it receives no compensation for transportation,[43] or being transferred by a terminal company from one road to another.[44] The length of the haul is immaterial.[45]

Under a provision of the Safety Appliance Act to the effect that nothing in the act shall apply to trains composed of four wheel cars or to trains composed of eight wheel standard logging cars where the height of such cars from top of rail to center of coupling does not exceed a specified number of inches, or locomotives used in hauling such trains when such cars or locomotives are exclusively used for the transportation of logs, standard flat cars having a height in the respect mentioned in excess of the specified number of inches are not within the exception,[46] even though used exclusively for the transportation of logs[47]

Under an interstate commerce commission regulation to the effect that carriers are not required to change the brakes from the right to left side on cars of a specified description, or to change the end ladders on such cars, except when such appliances are renewed, at which time they must be made to comply with the ordinary standards, a road renewing either appliance must comply with such ordinary standards, even though the other appliance is not required to be renewed at the same time.[48]

Grab irons or handholds. The requirement that cars should be equipped with proper grab irons or handholds is violated if adequate grab irons are not provided,[49] unless a suitable substitute is furnished[50] The requirement applies to both the ends and the sides of cars,[51] and end grab irons should be located at that point in the ends of cars where they will afford train men greater security for coupling operations.[52] Passenger cars,[53] as well as freight cars,[54] are within the statute. The grab iron provision is applicable to car, as well as train, movements.[55]

b. Automatic Coupling

Cars subject to the requirements of the Federal Safety Appliance Act must be so equipped as to be capable of being coupled or uncoupled automatically without anyone being required to go between the ends of the cars.

Under the Federal Safety Appliance Act, the cars used must be equipped with couplers that couple automatically by impact and which can be uncoupled without the necessity of anyone going between the ends of the cars;[56] and these provisions apply both to the act of coupling[57] and to that of uncoupling.[58] The act is violated if the couplers, by reason of their defective condition or other cause, cannot be operated in the usual manner without operatives going between the cars.[59] Thus violation may arise from failure to furnish the original equipment,[60] from a deliberate act making the coupling apparatus inoperative,[61] or because the coupling apparatus has got out of order,[62] been disconnected,[63] been rendered inoperative by defects in,[64] or disconnection of,[65] other apparatus, or for any other reason has become unavailable for use.[66] The presence of a defective uncoupling lever may violate the act, even though another and operative lever is available.[67] However, it has been held that the absence of an uncoupling lever is not a violation of the act if uncoupling can nevertheless be managed without operatives going between the cars[68]

Each end of every car. The statute ordinarily requires the designated coupling and uncoupling apparatus at each end of every car.[69]

Locomotive is a "car" within the meaning of the statute,[70] and, if intended in its use to be coupled at either end, must have automatic couplers, in working order, at each end.[71] If both ends of the locomotive are not intended for coupling use, it need not have automatic couplings at each end.[72] The view has been expressed that the automatic coupler is not required between a locomotive and its tender.[73]

Empties. The automatic coupling requirement applies to empty cars.[74]

Twin load. The automatic coupler requirement has been held inapplicable as between cars carrying a twin load.[75]

Requirement as to drawbars applies to any use of a defective bar.[76]

Switching movements. The automatic coupler requirement has been held applicable to cars used in switching operations.[77]

c. Brakes

(1) In general

(2) Train or switching movements

(1) In General

The Federal Safety Appliance Act, requires that trains be equipped with power or air brakes operated automatically from the engine and employed on a specified percentage of the cars; and such brakes must be properly maintained for use.

The Federal Safety Appliance Act requires an efficient braking system on railroad trains.[78] Under the statute and regulations pursuant thereto, every train must be equipped and operated with power or air brakes operated automatically from the engine and used on a specified percentage of the cars, and a railroad company is liable for running a train in violation of these provisions.[79] The power brake requirements apply to movements of a train as distinguished from movements of individual cars not operating as trains.[80] A train in the statutory sense is an engine and cars assembled, coupled and running or ready to run along the railroad,[81] and includes transfer trains,[82] and trains operated to their destination by a switching crew.[83]

Hand brakes. The Safety Appliance Act requires cars to be equipped with efficient hand brakes.[84]

Number of cars necessary to be braked. Under the Safety Appliance Act and the orders of the interstate commerce commission a specified percentage of the cars in the train must have their brakes operated by the engineer of the locomotive, and all power-braked cars in the train which are associated together with the specified percentage must have their brakes so operated[85] "Associat-

In the Safety Appliance Act requiring safety equipment on railroad trains and locomotives, the term "train brakes" is not confined to any narrow or technical meaning, but includes power-driving wheel brakes, and refers to same kind of brakes as are mentioned elsewhere in same statutes.—U. ed together with," as used in the statute, means connected on the air line of the train,[86] and a car may be a power-braked car within the statute, even though its brakes have been cut out.[87] Thus a power-braked car, the brakes of which are defective, cannot be put into the middle of the other cars but must be put at the end; if in the middle, it is associated with the others and must be subject to the control of the engineer.[88] A helper or pusher engine and its tender, situated at the end of the train and outside the air line, are not associated with the other cars so as to require that their brakes be operated by the engineer of the locomotive drawing the train;[89] when so situated they are not "cars,"[90] or at least are not "power-braked cars,"[91] within the air brake provisions of the act.

The statute is satisfied if the required percentage of cars is equipped and operated with power or air brakes,[92] cars not so equipped or operated being placed at the rear end of the train.[93] It is equally lawful for the permissible percentage of nonpower-braked cars to be those equipped only with hand brakes or those equipped with power brakes cut out.[94]

Maintenance and use. The requirement that a train shall be equipped with power brakes[95] or that a car shall be equipped with efficient hand brakes[96] contemplates that such brakes shall be maintained for use. Failure to use existing power brakes is as much a violation of the act as failure to supply such brakes,[97] and the statutory requirement for hand brakes does not make the use of power brakes in train movements optional.[98] It is a violation of the statute to use both power and hand brakes,[99] as the object of the power-brake requirement is to relieve trainmen from the necessity of using the hand brakes in train movements.[1]

A "locomotive," within the meaning of the provisions of the Federal Safety Appliance Act dealing with power-driving wheel brakes, means an engine constructed and used for traction purposes on a railroad track,[2] and the mere fact that an engine is self-propelling does not make it a "locomotive."[3] Conversely, where an engine is being used for traction purposes on a railroad track, it is a locomotive regardless of whatever else it might also be.[4]

Repair of defective power brakes. There is authority to the effect that a train properly equipped with air brakes may, where they become defective in transit, be moved to the nearest place for repairs.[5] However, the statutory exception permitting movement for the repair of brakes is applicable only to cases where the repairs cannot be made on the spot,[6] and the movement is for the purpose of reaching the nearest repair point.[7]

(2) Train or Switching Movements

The power-brake requirements of the Federal Safety Appliance Act apply to train movements, but not to mere switching movements; and the determination of whether a movement is one or the other is not controlled by the kind of track, the distance of the movement, the number of cars, or the name given to the train crew, but depends rather on the essential nature of the operation.

It is settled law that the power-brake requirements relate to train movements[8] and not to switching operations or movements.[9] Between these two types of movement lies a legal "No man's land,"[10] concerning which no exact rule can be laid down,[11] and in connection with which the decision as to whether the case falls within or without the statutory requirement must depend on the particular facts involved.[12]

The test of whether the movement of an engine and cars is a train movement, so as to subject the railroad to penalty for not having air-brake connections with the engine, or is a mere switching movement, lies in the essential nature of the operation or the work done.[13] While the court will consider the character of the tracks used,[14] and similar facts,[15] nevertheless such factors as the kind of track,[16] the distance of the movement,[17] and the number of cars[18] are not controlling. Reason for rule

The reason why the act has not been applied to situations characterized as switching is that they do not ordinarily fall within the meaning of the word "train" and involve a frequent coupling and uncoupling of cars within very limited areas which have been thought to render the use of air brakes impracticable and unnecessary to achieve the purposes of the act.—U. name given to the train crew is not controlling, and, hence, the question is not determined by whether the operation is by a switch engine and switch crew, or by a regular engine and crew.[19] Likewise, the name given to the place of operation[20] or the designation of yard limits[21] by the railroad cannot, standing alone, determine the character of the movement.

With respect to the existence of accompanying hazards on the route, such as crossings, there is not necessarily an essential difference between a public crossing and a private way;[22] nor is the existence of more than one crossing necessary in order to create sufficient hazards to render the act applicable.[23] The minimizing of the element of danger to employees or to members of the public using the streets which are crossed, by posting signalmen at intersections, or by traveling at slow speeds, cannot affect the question[24]

Classification for accounting purposes. The classification by the interstate commerce commission of particular railroad operations as "switching" for accounting purposes has little, if any, weight, in determining whether movements in question are "train movements" within the application of the Safety Appliance Act.[25]

Mixed train movement and switching operation are within the act as to that part which constitutes a train movement.[26]

d. Repair of Defective Cars

Railroads must keep their appliances in repair. Under the repair amendment, they are permitted, within the limitations and for the purposes specified, to haul a defective car to the nearest available repair point; but the amendment will not be extended beyond its express terms.

The railroad is under a duty to keep its appliances in repair,[27] and government inspectors are not obligated to advise a railroad company of defects discovered by them, and their failure to do so does not relieve the company of its obligation to repair[28]

Under the repair amendment to the Federal Safety Appliance Act a defective car can, within the limitations imposed, be hauled to the nearest available repair point without subjecting the railroad to a penalty.[29] This amendment has been construed as relaxing the rigid rule theretofore obtaining,[30] and to permit the defective car to be hauled in connection with cars commercially used,[31] or in revenue trains.[32] However, the exception granted by the amendment must be given a strict construction to preserve the integrity of the act.[33] The amendment will not be extended beyond its express terms,[34] and has been held not to permit hauling a defective car before discovery of the defect,[35] or for purposes other than repair,[36] nor if the defect can be repaired on the spot:[37] nor if the defect originated on a connecting pri-

Factor to be considered

The fact that assemblage of cars is transferred by operation without timetables or block signals with a switching engine and yard crew is a fact to be considered in determining whether the movement constitutes a train movement but is not controlling.—U. vate[38] or public[39] railroad, unless the movement is purely incidental.[40] In order to be within the amendment, it must appear that the car was originally equipped in proper fashion and became defective during use,[41] except that the repair proviso applies to cars built without safety appliances where an extension period for properly equipping such cars has not yet expired.[42]

The nearest available point for repair is to be determined with respect not only to distance, but also to all other factors.[43] Mere congestion of work at the nearest repair point has been held insufficient to justify hauling a defective car to a more distant point.[44]

Where the defect lies in the automatic coupling device, and the car is hauled in connection with cars commercially used[45] or in revenue trains,[46] the hauling should be done by using drawbars instead of chains for coupling purposes,[47] unless the car contains perishable freight or live stock, in which case chains are permissible.[48] In other words, if the car is defective to the extent that it must be coupled with chains, it must not be hauled "as is" or in trains unless it is loaded with live stock or perishable freight.[49] Cars may be hauled with chains if not in connection with cars commercially used or in revenue trains.[50]

Prior to repair amendment. Under the statute prior to the repair amendment a defective car capable of repair without moving to a repair point had to be repaired on the spot.[51] If the defect was such that it could not be repaired on the spot, some authorities considered it permissible for the railroad to haul the defective car to a repair point,[52] provided it was taken to the nearest place.[53] Other decisions denied the power to haul the car even to a repair point,[54] unless the car was moved by itself and not in connection with revenue cars or trains.[55] A railroad was under a duty to inspect cars delivered to it by other connecting railroads and refuse to transport them if not properly equipped.[56]

§ 426. —— State Safety Appliance Acts

The validity of state statutes requiring safety appliances on railroad rolling stock used in intra-state traffic has been upheld, the primary purpose of such statutes being the protection of railroad employees.

The primary purpose of state statutes requiring safety appliances on railroad rolling stock used in intra-state traffic is the protection of railroad employees,[57] and the validity of such statutes has been upheld.[58] It has been said that the duty of the railroad to the state under a penal statute of this character is satisfied by the exercise of a high degree of care.[59]

Intra-state traffic. A state statute imposing a penalty for moving defective cars in intra-state traffic applies to a car actually carrying intra-state traffic, even though the defective car was generally used for interstate traffic,[60] or was at the time part of a train carrying interstate traffic.[61] The fact that the railroad was an interstate road does not relieve it from liability for state penalties as to cars used in intra-state traffic.[62]

Repair of defective equipment. Under state statutes it has been held that the road may haul a defective car to a repair point.[63]

Automatic couplers. Under a state statute providing that it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to haul, or permit to be hauled or used on its line, any locomotive, car, tender, or similar vehicle used in moving state traffic, not equipped with automatic couplers, the car and not the train is the unit as to which penalty is imposed,[64] and every car must be equipped with automatic couplers.[65] Automatic coupler requirements of state statutes have been held inapplicable to electric cars,[66] cars used on a railroad in the process of construction,[67] and locomotive tenders,[68] and not to forbid the continued use of old cars not so equipped before enactment of the statute.[69] It has been held that a state statute imposing a penalty for using cars not equipped with automatic couplers applies only to cars completely lacking such couplers, and not to cars with inoperative couplers,[70] and that the use of cars having automatic couplers, but in a defective condition, is penalized under a different statute relating specifically to the use of cars with couplers out of repair.[71]

Braking. A state statute requiring a brake and brakeman on the rear car of a freight train not operated by power brakes from the engine has been held applicable to train movements,[72] but not to switching operations.[73] A statute requiring a brake and brakeman on the hindmost car of all trains transporting passengers and merchandise applies only to trains carrying both.[74] A statute requiring brakes on every freight car except four-wheeled cars applies to every type of freight car except those specifically exempted.[75]

Lumber cars. Under a statute requiring every railway company to supply all proper equipment and appliances on flat cars furnished for transporting lumber, and providing that a shipper compelled to furnish such equipment and appliances himself may collect from the road a specified penalty per car, a railroad is under no duty so to equip cars supplied to the shipper by other railroads for use on its line.[76]

§ 427. —— Miscellaneous Regulations as to Equipment

The operating equipment of railroads must conform to regulations pertaining to such matters as locomotive signal devices, headlights, rear end equipment, automatic train control, and cabooses.

Among the powers of a state to regulate the operating equipment of trains may be included the power to require and regulate locomotive signal devices.[77] Whether or not a signal equipment statute is sufficiently certain and definite to be enforceable will depend on the particular language employed.[78] A statute requiring locomotives to be equipped with an automatic bell ringing device is valid.[79]

Headlight statutes or rules. Within its powers to regulate the operating equipment of railroads, a state may make provision for and regulate locomotive headlights,[80] and may make a reasonable classification as to locomotives subject thereto.[81] Under a statute requiring railroads to equip every locomotive with an adequate headlight, a gasoline propelled car is a "locomotive" which must be so equipped.[82] A locomotive passing through a yard does not necessarily come within statutory exceptions relative to switching service.[83] It has been stated that the duty to obey a headlight statute is mandatory.[84]

The rule of the interstate commerce commission requiring a rear headlight applies to a locomotive which makes regular trips with a train from one point to another over the road and which is from necessity required to run backward for some portion of such trips;[85] and the use of a rear headlight is excused only in terminal movements or where a portion of the train becomes detached and the engine is proceeding to pick it up.[86]

Rear end equipment. Among its regulatory powers as to operating equipment, a state or commission may regulate the construction of the rear platform of the rear car of a train.[87] A state statute providing that it shall be unlawful for any railroad to operate any train consisting of United States mail or express cars without the rear end of the rear car being equipped with an exit free from obstruction, a platform of a specified width, a guardrail, and steps, is violated by running a train without the specified rear car equipment notwithstanding the rear car complied with federal specifications as to mail cars;[88] and the state commission may order the rear end of the rear car to comply with such a state statute even though a mail car so constructed would violate federal regulations as to mail cars, since there is no necessity that a mail car of federal specifications be the end car of the train.[89]

Automatic train control. The validity of regulations requiring the installation of automatic train control devices has been upheld.[90] However, the road should be afforded a reasonable time for compliance.[91]

Cabooses. Where empowered by statute, a commission may promulgate and enforce an order for the operation of a caboose as a component part of a freight train, if such equipment and operation are essential to the protection, welfare, and safety of railroad employees and the traveling public;[92] and a statute requiring a door and outside platform at each end of a caboose car, instead of at one end only, is within the police power of the state.[93] However, a commission cannot require a railroad to furnish a caboose car for its train crews where the statutes do not grant the commission power to impose such a requirement,[94] as, for example, where the authority with respect to caboose cars granted to the commission is limited to making exceptions.[95] An order of a commission pertaining to the necessity of an extra caboose must not be so vague and indefinite as really to furnish no rule or standard at all.[96]

§ 428. Signals

a. In general
b. Regulation by municipality
c. Places to which signal requirements apply

a. In General

The state or a duly authorized board or commission may require the use of prescribed signal devices to warn of the approach of a train at crossings or other places, in which event the signal should be given at a proper distance and by the type of device specified.

Aside from statute, there is no absolute duty to sound signals when a train approaches a highway crossing,[97] but a railroad is under a duty to give such signals as are required by the exercise of due care under the circumstances involved.[98] Under its general power to regulate the operation of railroads, a state or a board or commission may require signal devices, to be used to warn of the approach of a locomotive or train when nearing highway crossings or certain other places,[99] and after repeal of a signal statute, the legislature may again regulate the matter by a second statute reimposing the requirements on a railroad in existence at the time of the repeal.[1] The purpose of signal statutes is to require warning of the approach of the train,[2] and such statutes should be liberally construed.[3] General statutes regulating the giving of signals must be complied with irrespective of charter provisions defining the railroad's duty in this respect.[4]

The particular requirements of signal statutes are a matter of legislative discretion.[5] The validity of a statute creating a rebuttable presumption that failure of a railroad to give a crossing signal was the proximate cause of a collision at such crossing has been upheld.[6] It would seem that a statutory obligation to signal on sighting a person on the track does not apply where the person sighted is near the track but not within striking distance of the train.[7]

Switch lights. Railroads may be required by statute to maintain proper lights on switch stands.[8] Under some statutes the light required is an electric or combustion light,[9] and a reflectorized lamp is insufficient.[10] A belt line railroad operated in a city for transferring freight from one railroad to another is a main track of a railroad so as to be within the switch light requirement of a statute requiring switches on the main tracks of railroads to be indicated by a signal light so attached as to indicate safety when the switch is closed and danger when it is open.

Distance at which signal should be sounded. Under a statute requiring a whistle to be blown before passing a point at a specified distance from a crossing, there is no obligation to blow the whistle after passing such point,[12] but it must be blown sufficiently in advance of such point to give adequate warning.[13] Under a statute requiring signals to be given at a specified distance from a town, the duty to give the signal at the distance specified is imperative,[14] and giving signals at shorter distances does not excuse failure to signal at the specified distance;[15] and the distance at which the signal should be given under such a statute is measured from the corporate limits,[16] and not from the station.[17]

Nature of signal. If the statute requires a signal by sounding the bell "or" whistle, either is sufficient;[18] but, if both are required, neither is sufficient without the other.[19] Under a statute requiring signals at intervals until a crossing is passed, the signals must be sufficient in number and volume to give adequate warning.[20] Under a statute requiring signals to be sounded at "short intervals" on approaching a town, and at "intervals" on leaving and while still within the corporate limits, signaling at "short" intervals is required on leaving as well as on approaching a town.[21] Where the statute requires a continuous signal under specified conditions, nothing short of this will suffice.[22]

Position and movement of train. Under statutes requiring signals a specified distance before reaching a crossing, it has been held that the signal must be given, although the train starts from a point less than the distance from the crossing,[23] but not where a train is pulling away from a crossing which at the time of starting it is entirely obstructing,[24] unless the statute also requires a signal to be given on starting the train.[25] Under a statute requiring signals to be sounded continuously for a specified distance before reaching a highway crossing, the signal must be sounded before cars are kicked over a crossing.[26] Under ordinances requiring a locomotive bell to be rung continuously while a train is in motion within the municipal boundaries, the requirement applies to all portions of the municipality,[27] including private railroad switchyards located within the municipality.[28] It has been both affirmed[29] and denied[30] that signal regulations apply to a backward movement of trains. A statute requiring the sounding of a signal on sighting any person or obstruction on the track has been held inapplicable to switching movements.[31]

Railroads and vehicles within statutes or ordinances. The company operating a railroad is ordinarily subject to signal requirements, even though it does not own the railroad.[32] Railroads incorporated or constructed before as well as after passage of signal statutes are subject thereto.[33] Signal regulations are ordinarily inapplicable to private railroads.[34] An inspection car run by steam is a locomotive within signal statute requirements.[35] A statute requiring that locomotives be equipped with a bell or a whistle has been held not to apply to a railroad gas motor car.[36]

b. Regulation by Municipality

A municipality duly empowered by statutory or charter provision may make reasonable regulations as to the signals which must be given in connection with the operation of trains within the municipal limits.

Under its general power to regulate the operation of railroads within municipal boundaries, a municipal corporation may make reasonable regulations respecting the signals to be operated and maintained in connection with the operation of trains running within the corporate limits.[37] A municipality may have the power to restrict the blowing of engine whistles or the ringing of bells within the corporate limits.[38]

Under particular charter or statutory provisions. Under a charter provision empowering a munici-

Repeal of ordinance

A city ordinance, adopting and codifying certain enumerated ordinances, and repealing all ordinances not enumerated or mentioned in saving clause, was held to repeal ordinance requiring railroads to erect and maintain electric gongs and signals at all street crossings in city.—City of Harrodsburg v. pal council to direct the use and regulate the speed of locomotive engines within the city, the municipality may impose a signal requirement.[39] Under a statute authorizing municipalities to provide protection against injury to persons and property in the use of a railroad, a municipality may impose signal requirements.[40] Under a statute requiring railroads to give such signals within cities as the legislative authorities thereof may require, the municipality has exclusive power to prescribe signal requirements within its borders.[41] An ordinance prohibiting the sounding of an engine whistle except in cases required by statute law and also except in cases of extreme danger does not relieve a railroad from a statutory requirement to sound a whistle,[42] and, furthermore, imposes the duty on a railroad of sounding a whistle immediately before entering a crossing if the circumstances attending the presence of a person on the track present a situation of extreme danger.[43]

Reasonableness of particular regulations will depend on the circumstances involved.[44]

Conflict with state laws. In so far as a municipal signal regulation conflicts with state laws, the latter control.[45]

c. Places to Which Signal Requirements Apply

The determination of whether signal requirements apply not only to public crossings, but also to other places such as private crossings or railroad yards, depends on the terms of the regulation.

Statutes in general language requiring signals at crossings apply to all public highway crossings,[46] including streets,[47] without reference to how such thoroughfares become public roads.[48] However, the requirement is inapplicable to places not public roads,[49] such as private crossings.[50] Under a statute requiring signals when trains approach crossings, there is no obligation to signal when not approaching a crossing,[51] and a part of the right of way used by public pedestrians is not a "crossing" within the meaning of a statute requiring signals at crossings.[52]

Particular statutory provisions. Under a statute requiring railroads to give signals at crossings over "public roads or private ways established pursuant to law," the obligation exists with respect to public roads not established by law,[53] but there is no duty to sound a signal before crossing a private way not established by law;[54] and it has been held that the road must not only be used but must also be maintained as a public highway.[55] Under statutes requiring signals where a railroad crosses a "traveled" public road, there is no obligation to sound the signal before a public road not "traveled."[56] Under statutes requiring signals to be sounded before crossing any "traveled place," whether or not any particular place is "traveled" within the meaning of the statute will depend on the facts and circumstances involved.[57] A statute requiring signals where a railroad crosses a "road or street" refers to a public way, and not a private one, such as a private farm crossing.[58]

Grade or raised crossings. Under statutes requiring signals to be sounded before crossing a public road, without specification as to grade, it is ordinarily held that the statutory duty applies only to grade crossings,[59] although there is authority to the contrary.[60]

Railroad yards. Statutes requiring signals to be sounded at a "public crossing" do not apply to places within the railroad yard where people have been accustomed to cross solely by sufferance of the company.[61]

Station or stopping place. Under a statute requiring signals of a train's approach to be given a specified distance from "any regular station or stopping place," a railroad junction at which passengers change trains is a "stopping place," even though there is no depot or platform there.[62] A place which is not a public road, and at which a railroad company was in the habit of stopping only for the purpose of taking on or putting off passengers on the latters' request, has been held not to be a "regular depot or stopping place" within the contemplation of a statute requiring a signal within a specified distance thereof.[63]

Cities, towns, and villages. Under a statute providing that on approaching a city or town the bell or whistle shall be sounded when the train is at a specified distance, and, at short intervals, until it reaches the depot or station, and, on leaving, shall be sounded when the train starts and at intervals until it has left the corporate limits, the obligation to signal applies with respect to an incorporated town irrespective of the location of its station,[64] and the obligation also exists with respect to that portion of the track between the corporate limits and the specified point outside such limits;[65] but such a statute has been held not to apply with respect to an unincorporated town.[66] A statute requiring signals at a specified distance from crossings outside of incorporated cities or towns has been held applicable to a crossing within the corporate limits but outside of the settled portion of the municipality,[67] and the obligation to signal arises when the train is within the specified distance irrespective of whether the train itself is within or without the corporate limits.[68] Under a statute requiring specified signals at crossings, but providing that the statutory requirement shall not interfere with contrary requirements of any city or incorporated town, in the absence of a conflicting ordinance the statutory requirements apply to crossings within such a municipality.[69] Under statutory provisions requiring signals at crossings generally, but excusing the giving of signals within town or city limits unless required by ordinance, signals should be sounded at a crossing within a village.[70] A statute providing for the giving of signals when a train is at a distance of one mile and is approaching a city or town has been held not intended to protect persons crossing the railroad outside the corporate limits, although within one mile thereof.[71]

§ 429. Lookouts

The state or a duly empowered municipality may require lookouts in connection with the operation of trains in which event a lookout must be maintained in the places specified by the regulations.

Within its powers to regulate the operation of railroads, a state may provide for and regulate lookouts on, or in connection with the running of, trains.[72] A municipal corporation, under its power to regulate the operation of railroads within municipal boundaries, may make reasonable regulations respecting lookouts[73] Municipal power to regulate lookouts kept on trains may arise from express statutory provision, or may be implied from the general welfare clause of a municipal charter.[74]

Lookout statutes are satisfied if one member of the train crew keeps an effective lookout.[75] Under a regulation requiring a watchman on the rear of a backing locomotive, the watchman must be stationed on the rear of the tender.[76] An engine[77] or motor car run on railroad tracks[78] may constitute a "train" within the meaning of lookout statutes

Place and nature of movement. Statutes requiring a constant lookout to be kept by train crews for persons and property on railroad tracks apply to cars and engines run in railroad yards,[79] as do also statutes or ordinances requiring a lookout on the rear end of a backward moving train,[80] which latter also apply to coupling movements.[81] However, there is authority to the effect that a statute requiring a lookout and efforts to stop the train on sighting any person or obstruction on the track is inapplicable to mere switching movements[82] Under a statute requiring a backing passenger train to be preceded by a man on foot to warn of its approach to a station, the distance of the track and train from the station necessary to raise the statutory duty will depend on the provisions of the statute[83] A railroad rule requiring a flagman to go to the rear of the train to protect it when a train stops under circumstances in which it may be overtaken by another train has been held to relate to unusual stops not contemplated or provided for,[84] such as may be caused by accident or mechanical failure between stations and the like,[85] and not station stops or other operations where the train is adequately protected by block signals and yard-limit rules.[86]

§ 430. Lighting Tracks

The state may regulate the lighting of tracks in the streets, or may delegate its power in this respect to municipalities. Regulations with respect to the lighting of tracks should be reasonable and must be sufficiently definite and certain to inform the railroad of what must be done.

While a state under its power to regulate the operation of railroads may provide for and regulate the lighting of tracks in streets,[87] it may, as a proper exercise of the police power, delegate this power to municipalities,[88] as where it authorizes municipal corporations to require railroads to light their tracks at crossings within the municipality[89] An ordinance requiring the lighting of tracks is not a tax measure.[90]

Under a statute authorizing municipalities to require railroads to "maintain" lights at track and street intersections, the municipality may require "installation" of lights at intersections theretofore unlighted.[91] Under a statute authorizing the municipality to require railroads to maintain lights similar to, and of equal power with, those used by the city in lighting the streets, the municipality cannot require maintenance of lights superior to those used by the city for lighting the streets.[92] It has been held that a railroad operating in compliance with a later statute eliminating street grade tracks cannot be compelled to light its tracks, under a prior statute, passed when tracks were on the street grade, requiring lighting of tracks.[93]

The ordinance should be sufficiently definite and certain to inform the company of what it is required to do,[94] as by specifying the time within which it must be complied with,[95] and fixing the time or times at which the tracks shall be kept lighted[96] Under some provisions, railroads can be required to light their crossings only at such times as they are used for the crossing of trains, and at reasonable times before and after such crossing.[97]

Reasonableness of regulation. Under statutes delgating to a municipality the power to regulate the lighting of railroad tracks within its corporate limits, the municipality may, by ordinance, prescribe any reasonable regulation governing the matter;[98] but this power of regulation must be reasonably exercised according to what may be necessary for the safety of the public at the crossing,[99] and not as a means of compelling the railroad company to light the city streets.[1]

Expense of lighting. Statutes may properly provide that, if the railroad company does not light its tracks as required by the statute, the municipality may do so at the company's expense.[2] However, in the absence of charter or statutory authorization, a municipality lacks power to require a railroad to light its tracks at its own expense,[3] and such power will not be inferred from general authorization to protect the public welfare,[4] or from specific authorization to regulate and control the lighting of streets.[5]

§ 431. Speed

a. In general
b. Power of municipality to regulate

a. In General

The state or a duly authorized board or commission may regulate the speed of railroad trains. Such regulations must be reasonable, and they apply to the trains, companies, and places specified.

A state has the power to regulate the speed of railroad cars, trains, and locomotives,[6] and may delegate such power to a board or commission;[7] and a grant of charter power to a railroad to regulate the speed of its trains does not deprive the state of its reserved power to control such matter.[8] However, such regulations are subject to constitutional restrictions[9] and must be reasonable in their nature and effect.[10] The courts, in the absence of statute or ordinance so authorizing, cannot fix the rate of speed at which trains should be operated within municipalities.[11]

In the absence of statute, railroads may run trains at any speed that is safe for their passengers and freight.[12] The duty of a railroad to use due diligence and care in the operation of its trains may obligate it to run trains at a slower rate than that permitted by statute.[13] As far as concerns speed, the operators of trains running on schedules are not required to heed everyone who makes a motion or attempts to communicate with them by signal, where the signals are not those in usual and ordinary use.[14] Regulations governing the speed of railroads must be construed as a whole.[15]

Speed limit "between" streets
An ordinance fixing speed limit for trains between named streets did not by the use of the word "between" exclude crossing on one of such named streets.—Smith v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., C.C.A.Fla., 127 F. 2d 798.

Trains and vehicles within regulations. When a regulation prescribes different speed limits for freight and passenger trains, the fact that a regular freight train is carrying passengers does not authorize it to proceed at the higher rate of speed[16] Speed regulations ordinarily apply to detached locomotives not hauling cars[17] Under a regulation restricting the speed of any through train along a specified street, an engine and tender engaged in dropping cars from the train prior to proceeding with it are subject to the regulation.[18] The word "vehicle," as used in a speed regulation ordinarily will not include locomotives or cars which run and are operated only over and on a permanent track or fixed way, unless the context of the regulation clearly indicates an intention to include them.[19]

Companies and persons within regulations. Statutes or ordinances applying in terms to any person running or causing trains to be run contrary to speed regulations apply to companies owning or operating the road,[20] as well as to the persons operating the trains.[21]

Territorial application in general. Ordinances limiting the rate of speed of trains within the corporate limits apply to all places within those limits,[22] including the unplatted and unsettled portions thereof,[23] the railroad switchyards,[24] and lands belonging to the railroad company,[25] and are not limited to movement of trains on the streets.[26] The prescribed speed limit should be observed as soon as the train starts across the city line.[27] Some provisions regulating the speed of locomotives and cars passing through towns, cities, and villages apply to organized, incorporated towns, cities, and villages, including the territory embraced in their limits as fixed by law,[28] and are not limited to the improved and inhabited portions of such localities.[29]

Under an ordinance restricting speed through traveled streets, places other than traveled streets are not within the speed regulation.[30] Under an ordinance restricting speed "over or across the surface of any public place, at any place" between designated streets, it has been held that the speed restriction applies to a public place, even though not between the designated streets[31] The question whether a municipal ordinance regulating the speed of trains is applicable to a particular locality may be for the jury under all the circumstances.[32]

Speed at crossings. Under regulations requiring trains to slow up on approaching public crossings, the requirement has been held applicable only to public[33] grade[34] crossings, and not to apply where compliance is an operating impossibility.[35] Under an ordinance limiting the speed of trains to a specified rate until specified safety devices are provided and put in operation at street intersections, the restriction ceases to be in force when the devices are constructed and put in operation,[36] and is not revived by the railroad's subsequent failure to operate them.[37] An ordinance permitting a higher rate of speed than that allowed by a prior ordinance on the condition that gates are constructed at crossings will not be construed as repealing the prior ordinance as to places where the condition has not been complied with.[38] The word "highway," as used in an ordinance restricting speed at a highway crossing unless specified safety devices are provided, is not limited to highways formally established by the authorities,[39] but also includes highways becoming such by prescription.[40]

Speed at stations. Under a penal statute forbidding trains or detached locomotives to run "into" or "through" a passenger station in excess of a specified speed, it is permissible to exceed such speed when running past a station wholly on one side of the track.[41]

b. Power of Municipality to Regulate

(1) In general
(2) Reasonableness and discrimination

(1) In General

It is generally considered that a municipality has only such power to regulate the speed of railroads as has been delegated to it, although its power in this respect may be implied from other powers expressly granted. A municipal speed regulation is invalid in so far as it may conflict with state laws.

While there is authority to the effect that municipal power to regulate the speed of railroad trains within the municipality exists independently of statute[42] or constitution,[43] the general rule is that a municipality has only such power in this respect as has been delegated to it expressly or impliedly by statute or constitution.[44] The power may be derived from express charter or statutory provisions,[45] or may be implied from other powers expressly granted,[46] such as the "general welfare" clause of a municipal charter.[47] Ordinarily, under its general powers to regulate the operation of a railroad within its limits, and to regulate the use of its streets by public utilities, a municipal corporation has the power to regulate and restrict the rate of speed of trains and locomotives while running within its corporate limits,[48] as a proper municipal police regulation.[49] Under a statute empowering a municipality to enact and enforce within its limits all local police, sanitary, and other regulations not conflicting with general laws, and in the absence of any state statute as to speed of trains, a municipality may require a railroad to observe such reasonable precautions as to speed of trains passing through the municipality as may be needful to public safety.[50] Statutes giving a board or commission general supervision of the regulation of operation of railroads do not deprive a municipality of its power to regulate the speed of trains within its corporate limits,[51] although there is authority to the contrary.[52]

The power of a municipality to regulate the speed of railroad trains and locomotives ordinarily extends to all places within the corporate limits,[53] even though outside of the limits of public streets and thoroughfares.[54] Under a statute providing that, when a railroad track is laid in a municipality, the council may regulate the speed of all locomotives and railroad cars within the corporate limits, the municipality may regulate speed at places other than street crossings.[55] to make such ordinances as are deemed necessary for the good order and government of the borough, it has been held that it lacks power to regulate the speed of trains within its limits.[56]

A police jury lacks power to regulate the speed of trains within municipalities.[57]

Conflict with state and federal laws. In accordance with general rules, a municipal regulation of the speed of trains is invalid in so far as it conflicts with state laws.[58] Under a statute empowering municipalities to make speed regulations and providing a specified penalty for violation, a regulatory ordinance providing a different remedy for violation is void.[59] A speed regulation is not invalid as a restriction on interstate commerce,[60] nor, under a federal statute forbidding obstruction of United States mails, is a municipal restriction of the speed of trains invalid as an obstruction of mail trains.[61]

Presumption of validity and reasonableness. A municipal speed regulation passed pursuant to legislative authority is prima facie valid,[62] and, while the presumption of validity is rebuttable,[63] the ordinance should not be declared invalid as unreasonable unless clearly of the latter character.[64] Mere restriction to a low speed is not in itself conclusive as to the unreasonable character of the regulation.[65]

(2) Reasonableness and Discrimination

Municipal regulations as to the speed of trains must be reasonable and must not be unlawfully discriminatory. The reasonableness of any given ordinance depends, in the final analysis, on the particular circumstances.

Municipal regulations as to the speed of trains must be reasonable,[66] and the courts ordinarily have power to declare a municipal regulation governing speed of trains invalid because unreasonable, even though the power to regulate speed has been expressly conferred on the municipality.[67] However, if the regulation is satisfactory in other respects, and also reasonable, it will be enforced,[68] and there is authority to the effect that an ordinance fixing the speed of trains within the limits or details prescribed by statute cannot be declared void as unreasonable.[69] The reasonable or unreasonable character of particular ordinances will, in the final analysis, depend on the particular circumstances involved.[70]

Discrimination. A municipal ordinance regulating the speed of railroad trains will be held invalid if it makes an unnecessary or unwarranted discrimination between competing roads.[71]

Full stop. An ordinance requiring trains to come to a full stop before crossing specified streets may be upheld as reasonable.[72]

Time. The reasonableness of municipal speed regulations should be determined as of the time of their application rather than as of the time of the enactment of the ordinance.[73]

Questions of law and fact. The question of the reasonableness of a municipal speed regulation is for the court[74] unless disputed questions of fact occur for submission to the jury.[75]

§ 432. Precautions on Crossing Other Railroads

The state or a duly authorized board or commission may require reasonable precautions to be taken in the operation of trains at track intersections with other railroads.

Under its powers to regulate the operation of railroads, the state may require reasonable precautions in the operation of trains at track intersections with other railroads.[76] Under some provisions, when the tracks of two railroads cross each other, the engineers and conductors must stop their trains within a specified distance of such crossing and not proceed until they know the way to be clear.[77] Under a statute providing that whenever railroads cross each other the trains shall be brought to a full stop a specified distance before the crossing, in the absence of specified safety devices or precautions thereat, a railroad leasing two intersecting roads and operating all trains thereon has been held obligated to comply with the statutory requirement.[78] Where a statute requires railroad trains to stop before crossing other railroads, and imposes penalties on both the engineer and the company for violation, it is no defense to an action against the railroad that the engineer in violating the statute acted against a company regulation requiring trains to stop.[79]

Regulation by municipality. Under charter authorization to regulate the speed and running of locomotive engines and railroad cars, a municipality lacks power to compel a steam railroad to stop trains before crossing a street railroad.[80]

Regulation by board or commission. Under a statute imposing the mandatory duty to stop trains before crossing other railroads, a public department granting permission to construct such a crossing cannot by regulation permit the railroad to reduce the speed of its trains before crossing instead of bringing them to the required full stop.[81] Under a statute requiring railroads to bring trains to a full stop before crossing other railroads at intersections not equipped with an interlocking device, a regulatory board, on proof that the railroad has been violating the statute at a particular junction, may properly order it to bring its trains to a full stop at such junction.[82]

In the District of Columbia the commissioners of the District have authority to make such requirements under the police powers delegated to them by congress.[83]

§ 433. Safety Devices and Flagman at Highway and Private Crossings

a. In general
b. Regulation by municipality
c. Regulation by board or commission

a. In General

The state may require railroads to maintain special precautions at crossings, such as flagmen, gates, or signboards, and the duty of the railroad to obey such regulations is imperative. Statutes of this nature should be liberally construed.

Under its powers to regulate the operation of railroads, the state may require the maintenance and operation of adequate safety devices at railroad and highway crossings,[84] such as flagmen,[85] gates,[86] and signboards;[87] and the validity of particular statutes regulating safety provisions at crossings

Freedom from immediate or expected obstruction

A statutory provision, that engineers, after stopping and before proceeding to run a train over a railway crossing, must "know the way to be clear," requires not only that the crossing be free from immediate obstruction but free from danger of such obstruction as ought reasonably to be expected, but it does not require knowledge that the way will certainly remain clear against all after occurring or extraordinary happenings.—Southern R. will depend on the application of general principles to the statutory provisions involved.[88] The power of the legislature to require railroad companies to provide safeguards at crossings is not affected by the fact that the intersecting highway was laid out after the construction of the railroad.[89] The duty to obey regulations relative to safety provisions at crossings is generally mandatory and imperative.[90] However, a substantial compliance with such a statute has been held sufficient;[91] and, under a regulation requiring a specified safety provision, there is no duty to furnish a different and unspecified safety provision.[92]

The proper authorities have the power, in case they think a crossing is particularly dangerous, to require special precaution to be taken by the railroad.[93] Under a statute requiring a railroad to furnish "suitable guards or signals" at highway crossings, the road may do either,[94] and, within limitations of statutory suitability, what the guards or signals shall be is for the railroad to determine.[95] A statute requiring railroads to maintain railroad crossing boards at highway crossings has been held to require the erection of customarily used crossing signals in the form of an "X" or a cross.[96] Chains, gates, or bars at crossings must be set in place an appreciable length of time in advance of an approaching locomotive,[97] and must be adequately lighted at night, notwithstanding the silence of the statutes on the subject, since otherwise they would constitute hazards in themselves.[98] A regulation requiring railroads to supply specified facilities at places where operated "lines of railroad" cross specified streets applies to crossing by both main[99] and spur[1] tracks.

Some statutes requiring railroads to erect signs at places where the railroad crosses a public road have been held not to require signs within the corporate limits of a municipality.[2] A regulation requiring the "proprietors" of railroads to maintain specified safety provisions at all crossings does not apply to a company having only a temporary right to run trains over the track of another company subject to its control.[3] Where a statute dealing with the proceedings and conditions to be complied with by a railroad in order to entitle it to construct its line across a road at grade makes no reference to warning signals, these being specifically dealt with by other sections, the statute will be considered as directed to safety measures other than highway warning lights and signs.[4]

Construction of statutes. Statutes requiring safety provisions at crosings should be construed liberally[5] and in such manner as to accomplish the legislative purpose of promoting safety and avoiding crossing accidents.[6]

Regulation by courts. Under statutes authorizing courts to regulate safety provisions at crossings, it is not essential to the power of the court to act that an existing hazardous condition should have

Purpose of statute imposing duty on railroad of maintaining crossing signs was not to prevent vehicles from running into railroad cars while standing on or passing over railroad at crossing, but was to give notice to persons approaching crossing of proximity of railroad.—Wichita Valley Ry Co. v. Fite, Tex.Civ. App., 78 S.W.2d 714.

Necessity of signs on both sides

Some statutes imposing the duty on railroads of maintaining crossing signs have been held not to require that signs be placed on both sides of the crossing.

Exclusive use of form of sign

By the enactment of a statute making it an offense for any unauthorized person to erect on or near a highway any device or sign which is in the form of a railway crossing sign board, the state appropriates that form of sign for this exclusive use so that travelers on the highways may not be misled but may rely on it as a true warning of the proximity of a railroad crossing.—John F. been caused by the railroad.[7] Under a statute authorizing a county court to make an order requiring a flagman or gates at a crossing, or such other order as may be deemed proper, the court may order the installation of an automatic signal.[8] Under a statute authorizing a court to compel provision of a flagman or gates at a crossing on application of "local authorities," the court may act on application of the authorities particularly charged with the care of the highway involved,[9] such as the highway commissioners,[10] or the superintendent of highways.[11]

Expense of providing safety devices. The matter of expense of installation of safety devices at crossings is ordinarily governed by statute.[12] Under statutes fixing the proportion of expense to be borne by two or more railroads in providing safety devices used by each, a regulatory board or commission is without power to vary the proportions.[13] However, under statutes not fixing the proportions, apportionment of expenses rests largely in the sound discretion of the board or commission regulating the installation of the safety devices.[14] A railroad having a statutory right to use the track of another road at a fixed compensation is not obligated to contribute as a "proprietor" of such road to the expense of maintaining safety devices at its intersection with highways.[15]

b. Regulation by Municipality

(1) In general
(2) Reasonableness

(1) In General

A municipality may be granted power to require railroads to have safety devices or flagmen at crossings in the municipality, and the exercise of such municipal power is not necessarily inconsistent with the existence of other regulatory powers over railroads vested in a board or commission.

Subject to constitutional restrictions, the state may delegate its power with respect to safety devices and flagmen at crossings to municipalities,[16] and an ordinance adopted under statutory authority, requiring flagmen to be maintained at crossings, comes into effect on its enactment virtually as a state statute.[17] According to one view a municipality may, under its general police and welfare powers, regulate safety devices at street and railroad intersections within the corporate limits,[18] but, even under this doctrine, if the general power is expressly restricted so as to exclude regulation of steam railroads, there is no power to regulate safety devices at the street crossings of such roads.[19] In other jurisdictions it has been held that, in the absence of express authorization, a municipality lacks power to regulate safety devices at street and railroad crossings.[20] According to the latter view, authority expressly granted to regulate safety devices at crossings will not be extended by implication to include nonenumerated powers.[21]

A statute empowering a municipality to require railroads to maintain safety devices at crossings within the municipal limits should not be given a strained construction for the purpose of defeating an ordinance which is within the spirit of the statute.[22] Under charters or statutes expressly authorizing a municipality to require provision of specified safety devices at street and railroad crossings, the municipal power to require safety devices of the kind specified is clear.[23] An ordinance prohibiting pass-

Construction of provisions in pari materia

A municipal code provision forbidding motorists to cross a railroad when a signal of danger is given by a flagman, or when no signal is given by such flagman, must be construed in pari materia with a provision requiring the flagman in charge at the crossing to remain at all times in full view of persons approaching the railroad and street crossing.—Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Goodwin, 131 So. 12, 222 Ala. 53.

age of a train over a street crossing until travelers detained by a preceding train have had time to cross has been held valid as a municipal police regulation.[24] Under a statute authorizing municipalities to require railroads to provide flagmen at any place where the railroad crosses a street or highway, a municipality may require a flagman at a place where a railroad crosses a footway,[25] and it is immaterial by what process the footway became a highway.[26] A statute expressly authorizing municipalities to require gates at street and railroad crossings has been held applicable to the crossing of a railroad with an interurban road over a street.[27] A statute permitting a municipality to require electric gong or alarm signals at crossings authorizes an ordinance requiring the erection of electric flashlight alarm signals.[28]

Where a municipal regulation as to safety provisions at crossings is invalid, the railroad is under no obligation to obey it.[29] Invalidity of an ordinance with respect to one crossing, however, does not necessarily render it invalid as to other crossings.[30]

Effect of authority or action of board or commission. A statute conferring on a board or commission exclusive powers to regulate operation of railroads deprives municipalities of the power to require railroads to provide flagmen or safety devices at street crossings.[31] However, where statutes granting regulatory power to boards or commissions are not inconsistent with other statutes granting power to municipalities to control safety provisions at crossings, municipalities retain such regulatory power.[32]

Where there is a conflict between an order of the commission specifying the type of protection required to be furnished at crossings, and a subsequently adopted municipal ordinance requiring the railroad to maintain flagmen at the crossings, the commission's order is controlling[33]

A village may not abrogate or nullify the order of a state board or commission relative to installation of safety devices at a village crossing.[34] Notwithstanding the right of a railroad to appeal to a commission from action taken by the municipal authorities, a resolution of the municipal authorities, if within the scope of statutory authority, is conclusive where no appeal has in fact been taken.[35]

Exercise of power by ordinance or resolution. Municipal regulation of safety devices at crossings should ordinarily be made by ordinance.[36] It may, however, be effected by resolution where the statute empowers the municipal authorities to act in such manner and they have substantially complied with the statute.[37]

(2) Reasonableness

Municipal regulations with respect to safety devices at street and railroad crossings should be reasonable, especially where promulgated under a general municipal power.

Municipal regulations of safety devices at street and railroad crossings ordinarily must be reasonable to be enforceable,[38] especially where passed under general, as distinguished from express, powers.[39]

Such regulations are presumptively reasonable,[40] and, where passed pursuant to express statutory authorization, will rarely be held invalid as unreasonable.[41]

Substitute devices. Use of an automatic warning device at crossings may[42] or may not[43] render it unreasonable to require humanly operated safety provisions, according to the circumstances involved.

Time of operation. Regulations requiring the operation of humanly run safety devices at times when there is practically no railroad[44] or street[45] traffic are ordinarily held unreasonable. On the other hand it has been held that ordinances requiring continuous operation of safety provisions are at least presumptively reasonable,[46] and there is also authority to the effect that such regulations are valid as designed to cover unlikely but possible use of the crossing.[47] If the ordinance is ambiguous as to the time of observing safety provisions, it will be so construed as to render it valid.[48]

c. Regulation by Board or Commission

In general, the state may delegate power over safety devices and flagmen at crossings to a board or commission, vesting discretion in such board or commission as to the kind of safeguards to be required; but the regulatory body may not exceed the powers granted to it by statute.

Subject to constitutional restrictions, the state may delegate its power with respect to safety devices and flagmen at crossings to boards or commissions.[49] Under constitutional provisions conferring on a board or commission general power to regulate all transportation companies in all matters relating to their public duties, it has power to regulate safety provisions at street crossings within a municipality.[50] The kind of safeguards to be required ordinarily rests in the discretion of the board or commission,[51] and a determination of the commission, acting within its authority, as to whether certain signals should be placed at railroad crossings will not be interfered with in the absence of an abuse of discretion.[52] Under a statute authorizing a board or commission to require maintenance of flagmen at highway crossings with tracks used for "switching" purposes, the board or commission may order a flagman at a highway crossing with tracks used for sidetracking one train to permit another to pass on the main line.[53] Under statutes authorizing a board or commission to regulate the operation of railroads generally, with particular respect to stations, and in a different section authorizing it to require safety provisions at crossings within municipalities, the board or commission may require safety provisions at a crossing without a municipality where such crossing is near a station.[54]

On the other hand, the power of a board or commission to regulate safety provisions at crossings is limited to that granted by statute;[55] and rules, regulations, and orders of a board or commission relative to safety devices at crossings must be reasonable.[56] Under some statutes the authority of a commission to require a railroad to station a flagman at crossings is confined to public crossings.[57] Where a statute authorizing a board or commission to regulate safety provisions at crossings is not retroactive, it confers no power to regulate crossings constructed before its enactment,[58] but in a proper case, an order of the commission may cover devices at crossings, irrespective of the date of their installation, including those installed prior to the order as well as those installed subsequent thereto.[59] Under statutes providing that, where tracks crossing a public highway are used for switching purposes, county commissioners may require maintenance of a flagman at a crossing, and other statutes providing that trustees of incorporated towns shall have "exclusive power over the streets," county commissioners have no power to require flagmen at street crossings.[60] Under statutes committing to a board or commission power to prescribe precautions to be used at highway crossings, exclusive of those specifically required by statute, the board or commission is not authorized to make a negative order prohibiting certain safety provisions.[61] Where a statute requires certain devices to be placed and maintained by railroads at crossings when ordered to do so by a commission, no duty is imposed on the railroad as a matter of law except when so ordered.[62]

Repeal of statute. A statute prescribing a uniform system of railway crossing signals is not impliedly repealed by a subsequent statute which, in effect, merely empowers a commission to require additional warning signals for the public safety.[63]

Necessity of protection for public safety. Under some statutes the commission has authority to require the installation of new and additional grade crossing protection which is necessary to the public safety.[64] While the commission, under such statutes, possesses a wide discretion and may determine what the public interests require, and also what measures are necessary for the protection and promotion of those interests,[65] nevertheless it can order a grade crossing improvement only when necessary to preserve or promote public safety,[66] and it not enough for the commission merely to find that the public safety will be thereby preserved and promoted.[67]

Expense. The regulatory power of a board or commission as to safety devices at highway crossings may be exercised despite the expense thereby caused the railroad.[68]

§ 434. Obstruction by Trains

a. In general
b. What constitutes obstruction

a. In General

A railroad may not obstruct a crossing for a greater period of time than permitted by statute or ordinance; but a municipal regulation as to the obstruction of streets by trains must be reasonable.

Under some statutes a railroad may not stop its train across a public road or street crossing for more than a specified time.[69] However, a statute making it an offense for a railroad to block any public crossing for more than a specified time except in municipalities having more than a stated population has been held invalid as making an act an offense if committed in one locality but not if committed in another.[70]

In accordance with its general power to regulate the operation of railroads within its borders, and to control the use of its streets by public utilities, a municipality ordinarily has power to regulate obstruction of its streets by trains, cars, or engines,[71] as by restricting the time that engines or cars may block a crossing,[72] or stand in specified streets,[73] or by specifying the particular time of the day during which trains may be operated along streets,[74] or during which switching and shifting of cars may take place on a street.[75] Statutes restricting the time during which engines or cars may stand on streets do not prevent municipalities from imposing greater restrictions.[76]

Reasonableness. A municipal regulation as to obstruction of streets by trains ordinarily must be reasonable[77] with respect to the rights of both the railroad company[78] and the general public.[79] An ordinance absolutely prohibiting a railroad company from blocking a city street by a train for a period of more than ten minutes, irrespective of contingencies wholly beyond the company's control, is arbitrary and unreasonable, and hence invalid.[80]

Rights and duties of railroad. A railroad is entitled to a reasonable use of streets where essential to the operation of its trains, but such right must be exercised with due regard to the rights and convenience of the general public.[81] No railway possesses the right to use a highway for the storage of cars,[82] and even a temporary deposit of cars in the highway is unlawful[83] in the absence of a proved emergency excusing it.[84] Statutes authorizing the construction of railroads on or across streets and highways do not authorize a railroad to obstruct the same by the operation of trains.[85] Under an ordinance forbidding the obstruction of streets by trains, it is nevertheless permissible to stop a train over a crossing for a reasonable time.[86] Under a statute prohibiting the blocking of highway crossings for over a specified period, if a train blocking a crossing is not ready to continue its journey at the end of such period, nevertheless some method must be found to clear the crossing.[87]

Railroads within regulatory requirements. Railroads incorporated or constructed before as well as after enactment of a statute prohibiting obstruction of public highway crossings are subject thereto.[88] Regulations prohibiting obstructions of highways are ordinarily applicable to companies operating the road irrespective of ownership.[89]

b. What Constitutes Obstruction

An unlawful obstruction of a crossing by a railroad may exist, although no one was actually prevented from using the crossing, and although the crossing was only partially blocked.

To constitute the obstruction of a highway crossing within the application of a statute or ordinance prohibiting the same, it is not necessary that there should have been any person present at the time who was actually prevented from using the crossing.[90] A statute forbidding the placing of any obstruction in a passway has been held inapplicable to obstruction thereof by a railroad train.[91]

Physical extent of obstruction. A partial obstruction is unlawful if of sufficient extent to constitute a substantial interference with the use of the crossing.[92] Some authorities hold that the obstruction must have been of such a character as to obstruct travel and interfere with the use of the highway,[93] and that, if not of this character, the mere fact that a train or car is left standing so as to project slightly within the limits of a crossing does not constitute an obstruction,[94] but there is authority to the effect that any degree of projection

by a car or engine into the street, however slight, constitutes an obstruction.[95]

Nature of way obstructed. The term "highway" in statutes prohibiting their obstruction applies to all kinds of public ways,[96] but not to a private way.[97] There is authority to the effect that highway obstruction statutes are inapplicable to permissive crossings.[98]

§ 435. Fires

A railroad and its employees may be required to adopt prescribed precautions against fire, particularly on passing through a forest preserve.

The intention of the legislature in enacting a statute setting up requirements as to spark arresters and smokestacks on engines has been held to be to prevent large cinders from escaping from the smokestacks of engines, as a protection to adjacent property from the hazard of fire,[99] and not to protect persons from sustaining injuries caused by cinders small enough to enter the human eye.[1]

Forest fires. Under a statute requiring railroads to remove from such parts of the road as pass through forests or lands subject to fire from any cause, all grass, brush, and other inflammable materials, twice a year, and where they pass through counties containing a forest preserve to remove such materials at more frequent intervals, the twice-a-year provision applies to lands in counties outside the forest preserve.[2] However, under statutory provisions preceded by the condition precedent that, "where the railroad runs through forest lands in counties containing part of the forest preserve," it shall observe specified fire precautions, the latter requirements apply only to counties containing part of the forest preserve,[3] and, under provisions that, where a road runs "near such lands," referring to forest preserves in a preceding section, it shall not deposit fire coals or ashes on the track, the prohibition extends only to counties contained in the forest preserve.[4] A provision, in such a statute, standing alone and requiring the road to put out fires on its own and neighboring lands refers only to counties containing forest preserve.[5]

Miscellaneous regulations to which railroads may be subjected include, among others, regulations with respect to the location of operation structures, the arrangement and composition of trains, motive power, smoke, and noise.

A railroad is required to exercise all statutory precautions for the prevention of accidents where the particular train involved is not engaged in switching operations.[6] A commission cannot order a railway company to maintain a private crossing where no power to make such an order has ever been given to the commission.[7]

Location of operation structures. The state's power to regulate the operation of railroads includes the power to designate the location of structures used in the operation of the road, such as general offices,[8] machine shops,[9] and roundhouses.[10] Under some statutes a commission has power to permit the maintenance of a structure which has been constructed without prior authority and with less than standard clearance,[11] particularly where the commission finds excusable neglect on the part of the company in its failure to apply for and obtain permission before the installations were made.[12]

Safety provisions as to arrangement and composition of trains. Provisions of a state constitution granting to a board or commission general, but not exclusive, power to regulate the operation of railroads, do not deprive the legislature of power to regulate the number of cars to be operated in one train.[13] So far as interstate commerce is concerned, however, some state statutes which arbitrarily limit the length of, or the number of cars in, a train have been held invalid,[14] but other statutes have been held not invalid[15]

A regulation requiring the engine to be placed in front of all occupied cabooses and cabin cars is not unreasonable where it is found that the use of a pusher engine in the rear is dangerous to life and limb.[16] A statute requiring the locomotive to be at the head of the train is designed to protect not only passengers,[17] but also travelers on the streets and highways.[18] Such a statute is not violated by operating an engine at the head of a train but running backward with the tender in front.[19]

Under statutes regulating the arrangement of mixed passenger and freight trains, a railroad operating such trains may be under a duty to place the baggage and freight cars in front of passenger coaches.[20]

Motive power. The state has power to regulate the motive power to be used by railroads;[21] and any restrictions in the charter or statute under which the company was incorporated or the road constructed as to the motive power to be used are binding on the company.[22] Where the charter permits the company to select the motive power but prohibits it from constructing its road through a municipality without the consent of the municipal authorities, such a consent may be granted on condition that the municipality shall retain the right to regulate the motive power to be used,[23] and in such case another railroad authorized by statute to operate trains over the tracks of the road so located is subject to the same control of the municipality.[24] So, also, it seems that a right conferred on a municipality to regulate the "manner of using" a railroad is broad enough to cover the kind of motive power to be used,[25] and that a municipality which has granted a franchise to a railroad to lay its tracks in the street may subsequently prohibit the use of steam in propelling cars along the street[26] In accordance with its general power to regulate the operation of railroads within its borders, a municipal corporation may regulate the use of steam as a motive power in the operation of railroads within its corporate limits.[27] A valid ordinance prohibiting the use of steam as motive power is binding on the purchaser of a company affected by the ordinance.[28]

Smoke. While it has been held to be beyond the province of local authorities to proscribe smoke in the operation of locomotives under a railroad charter, unless its escape be attributable to negligence or want of care,[29] this principle has no bearing on the functioning of terminal facilities and fixed installations, such as engine houses and repair shops.[30] Nevertheless, an ordinance declaring the emission of dense smoke from the chimney of any building to be a nuisance which might be summarily abated by a building inspector has been held void as unreasonable and arbitrary in its operation on the business of a railroad company maintaining a roundhouse within the municipality,[31] and also as delegating to the inspector authority and discretion to exercise summary power without defining the terms and conditions under which such discretion could be exercised.[32]

Noise. In the reasonable exercise of its general powers to regulate the operation of railroads within its borders, a municipality may regulate the noise made by railroads operating within its borders.[33] However, in so far as a municipal regulation forbidding the blowing of a steam whistle within the municipal limits interferes with general state laws requiring the giving of specified signals, the municipal regulation is void.[34]

Crossings. The state may regulate railway crossings,[35] and, in the exercise of its police power, may prescribe regulations designed to prevent injuries thereat.[36] The legislature may by statute confer on a commission exclusive jurisdiction over all questions relating to the matter of railroad crossings.[37] Statutes relating to the duty of railroad companies to maintain public crossings in a proper condition for travel, and defining the extent of such crossings, were held not superseded or repealed by an act creating a state highway department and establishing a state system of public roads.[38]

D. PENALTIES FOR VIOLATION OF REGULATIONS

§ 437. Power to Impose

Railroads may be subjected to a penalty for violation of state regulations or regulations promulgated by a municipality pursuant to statutory authority.

In order to enforce its power to regulate the operation and facilities of railroads, the state has the power to affix a penalty for the violation of its regulations,[39] provided a reasonable time is allowed for compliance with the regulation,[40] and provided the penalty imposed is not unreasonably large.[41] A railroad may be liable for a penalty for violation of municipal regulations promulgated pursuant to statutory authority.[42] Since corporations in operating railroads can act only through their agents, the company may be made subject to a penalty for defaults on the part of its servants.[43] Piles and pieces of scrap iron left for short periods of time near the center line of a railroad track do not constitute a permanent or fixed structure or obstruction within the meaning of a statute imposing a penalty for maintaining such a structure or obstruction within a specified distance of the track.[44]

Discontinuance of service or facilities. It has been held that discontinuance of service without prior application to a commission for permission, as required by statute, does not justify subjection of the road and its employees to statutory penalties in advance of a hearing on the merits as to discontinuance;[45] and the imposition of a penalty for the discontinuance of a depot without the consent of the commission has also been held not warranted where the depot had been operated at a loss so that the commission could not have compelled its continued operation.[46] A statute prescribing a specified penalty per day for failure to operate a railway has been held inapplicable to a railway company which discontinues its service under a claim of right.[47]

§ 438. Willfulness as Element

Willfulness is not an essential element to liability of a railroad for a penalty unless the statute requires the existence thereof.

Under statutes requiring a willful violation to subject the road or its employees to penalty, no penalty will be imposed in the absence of this element.[48] However, where the penalty is imposed for "refusal or neglect" to perform the duty, willfulness is not essential to liability.[49]

§ 439. Defenses

Invalidity of the statute or order violated is a defense to an action for a penalty; but such matters as the absence of actual damage, or a violation by servants of the rules of the company, or an absence of knowledge of the acts of its employees do not constitute a defense.

Invalidity of the statute[50] or order[51] violated by a railroad is a valid defense to an action for a penalty. It is no defense that no actual damage has resulted from such violation,[52] or that the act constituting such violation was done by the servants of the railroad contrary to the rules of the company,[53] or without its knowledge and in violation of express instructions.[54] Where a statute imposes a duty to which a penalty is attached, the penalty cannot be avoided by failing to do some other act necessary to the performance of the duty commanded.[55] Under a statute prescribing a penalty for the death of any person from the negligence of "any officer, agent, servant or employee" while operating a locomotive, car, or train, it is no defense that the negligence was not that of the superior in charge.[56]

It has been said that the only possible defenses to a penalty proceeding under the Federal Safety Appliance Act for using a defective car are nonuse of a defective car and use permissible in accordance with the provisions of the repair amendment.[57] The amendment of the Federal Safety Appliance Act permitting the hauling of defective cars to the nearest available repair point is not retroactive so as to relieve a railroad from penalty for a violation before its passage.[58] Liability of a railroad for a penalty for failure to comply with such act will not be excused by want of knowledge of the operating defect,[59] since knowledge on the part of the company of the defect or condition is not a necessary element of the offense,[60] and government inspectors are not obligated to reveal a defect which they discover,[61] nor will the railroad be excused by the absence of intentional violation,[62] by the exercise of reasonable care,[63] by the putting of a warning on a defective car,[64] or by the use of other precautions equivalent[65] or actually superior[66] to the requirements specified by statute; nor will it be excused by the existence of circumstances making it difficult[67] or impossible[68] to operate and comply, as in the latter case the railroad can and should refrain from operating the defective rolling stock [69]

Contributory negligence on the part of the person aggrieved is no defense to an action in the name of the state to recover the penalty prescribed for failing to give crossing signals [70]

Notice. A statute prescribing a penalty for failing to remove obstructions from a private road or crossing place after notice of "at least" a certain length does not fix the limit of time for removal, but merely prescribes the minimum notice under which the company might be held liable, leaving the maximum to be determined by the circumstances of the particular case.[71]

Statute of limitations applicable will depend on the facts and the language of the statutes involved.[72]

§ 440. Persons Entitled to Sue

Suit to recover a penalty from a railroad may be maintained by the state or, under some statutes, by a private person.

Under a statute providing that the penalty shall be sued for in the name of the state, and having no other provision as to who may sue, the right to sue is vested solely in the state,[73] and the action cannot be brought by a private person in the name of the state.[74] Under a statute allowing a traveler on the street to recover a penalty for the obstruction of a street by a railroad, a passenger in a street car on the street obstructed may recover.[75] Under statutes permitting recovery by the "person aggrieved," one damaged as the proximate result of the violation of the statute is entitled to sue for the penalty.[76] Under a statute permitting suit by the prosecuting witness, it is not essential to the right to maintain the action that the prosecuting witness should actually have testified in the case.[77]

§ 441. Persons Liable

The operating railroad may be liable for penalties even though it does not own the road; and liability is sometimes imposed on a particular officer or agent.

A company operating a railroad may be liable for penalties imposed for violation of regulations affecting operation, even though it does not own the road,[78] and it has been held that the operating railroad is the owning railroad so as to be liable to penalty for violation of a statute of this character.[79] However, under a statute imposing a penalty on any company "operating" a railroad for violation of certain statutory regulations, a lessor company is not liable for a penalty incurred by the lessee in the operation of the leased road.[80]

Statute imposing liability on a particular officer or agent is inapplicable to any other officer or agent not acting in the capacity named.[81]

Under the Federal Safety Appliance Act each interstate railroad involved in a violation thereof is liable for the penalty imposed [82] State officers charged with the administration of a state owned railroad are not personally liable for penalties for breaches of the Federal Safety Appliance Act, where they had no knowledge of the alleged violation, the immediate supervision being the duty of an inspector appointed by them and his subordinates being civil service employees [83] In determining whether a railroad is liable where it operates a train by its crew over the tracks of another railroad, the court should avoid an interpretation of the statute which would exonerate a carrier from liability where it has the actual physical control of the defective car on a line over which it may lawfully pass.[84]

Effect of contract

Where defendant operated its trains to a designated point over connecting carrier's tracks, and a box-car with a defective running board was discovered in defendant's train on connecting carrier's track, defendant was liable for statutory penalty for hauling "on its lines" a car improperly equipped, notwithstanding contract with connecting carrier providing that as between carriers, defendant's trains should be considered as belonging to connecting carrier while on connecting carrier's tracks and notwithstanding that connecting carrier might also be liable for penalty.—U. S. v. New York Cent. R. Co., supra.

Separate coach statutes. Under statutes requiring railroads to provide separate coach accommodations for white and colored passengers, a railroad providing such accommodations is not subject to penalty because a train employee directs[85] or permits[86] a passenger of one race to ride in a coach designated for the other. Under a statute imposing a penalty on a railroad conductor for failure to enforce separation of whites and blacks in railroad coaches, it would seem that a conductor is not liable for failure to compel separation of the races in a Pullman attached to his train, but owned and operated by a separate company and its employees.[87]

§ 442. —— Effect of Operation by Receiver

The receiver of a railroad is not liable for a statutory penalty unless clearly within the provisions of the statute.

A railroad company is not liable for a statutory penalty incurred while the road is being operated by a receiver;[88] nor is the receiver liable for such penalty,[89] unless clearly within the provisions of the statute.[90]

§ 443. Actions

a. In general
b. Pleadings
c. Evidence
d. Trial and review

a. In General

The provisions of the particular statute determine whether proceedings against a railroad to recover a penalty should be instituted by civil action rather than by indictment.

Proceedings to recover a penalty against a railroad should ordinarily be instituted by an appropriate form of civil action and not by indictment,[91] the action being regarded as civil rather than criminal in nature.[92] However, under statutes providing for criminal procedure in the recovery of penalties, the proceeding may be instituted by indictment[93] or information.[94] Under a statute failing to specify whether penalties shall be recovered in a civil or criminal proceeding, it has been held that the penalty should be recovered in a criminal proceeding.[95] Under a statute empowering municipalities to regulate the speed of trains within their limits and to enforce such regulations by penalties to be collected by civil action, a municipality cannot provide by ordinance for collection of penalties by criminal proceedings.[96]

Action of debt. In jurisdictions where a civil suit is brought to recover a penalty against a railroad, it has been held that the proceeding may be an action of debt,[97] but not an action on the case.[98]

Name in which action brought. Under statutes so permitting, an action against a railroad for a penalty may be brought in the name of the person entitled thereto.[99] Under a statute providing for payment of a penalty to a specified political subdivision of a state, the action cannot be brought in behalf of the state.[1]

b. Pleadings

The complaint in an action against a railroad for a penalty should allege facts bringing the case within the statute, and should be sufficient to apprise defendant of the charge made and the court of the issues to be tried. The answer should plead facts, rather than mere legal conclusions, and should set forth any matters relied on by way of avoidance.

The complaint in an action against a railroad for a penalty must allege every fact necessary to bring the case strictly within the statute creating the liability;[2] and when based on a violation of a statute after its amendment, the complaint must state facts bringing the case within the terms of the amendment.[3] The sufficiency of particular complaints may depend on the particular statute or ordinance and the circumstances involved.[4] Under the general rule in some jurisdictions, the complaint must show the statute under which the penalty is claimed,[5] and aver that the act complained of was contrary to the form of the statute.[6]

A complaint alleging the facts need not allege legal conclusions therefrom.[7] Although in the form of an indictment, a pleading may be sustained as a complaint if it contains the necessary allegations.[8] Under the Federal Safety Appliance Act allegations that defendant acted knowingly or negligently are not necessary.[9] Under a statute declaring the orders of a railroad commission prima facie reasonable, the complaint need not aver facts showing the reasonableness of an order alleged to have been violated.[10] Where statutes relating in terms to owners of railroads are construed as applying to the companies operating them, an allegation that defendant was operating the railroad in question at the time of the violation complained of is a sufficient allegation of ownership.[11] Under a statute impliedly defining a regular station as one with an agent, an allegation that a station is a regular station impliedly includes the allegation that it is an agency station.[12]

Definiteness and certainty. Complying with general rules, the complaint must be sufficiently definite and certain to apprise defendant of the exact charge against him and the court of the issue to be tried.[13] An allegation that the violation occurred on or about a certain date has been held sufficiently definite.[14] In an action for a penalty for failing to give crossing signals the complaint to be sufficiently certain must designate the particular highway crossings where the signal was not given,[15] and should state the time of day when the train crossed the highway, its direction and the kind of train, whether freight or passenger.[16]

Separate counts. A complaint may properly contain separate counts for separate violations of a penal statute.[17]

Answer. A plea specifically stating a particular defense to the merits is good as against demurrer.[18] The general rule that facts, and not mere legal conclusions, should be pleaded in an answer applies to an answer in a suit against a railroad for a penalty.[19] Matter in avoidance should be pleaded;[20] and in an action against a railroad to recover penalties under the Federal Safety Appliance Act the railroad must plead facts bringing it within the statutory exceptions from liability.[21]

Issues, proof, and variance. In compliance with general rules, the proof must conform to the allegations of the complaint, any material variance being fatal to a recovery.[22]

c. Evidence

The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to make out a case, but the burden is on the railroad to bring itself within an exception in the statute. The usual rules prevail with respect to the admissibility of evidence, and the weight and sufficiency thereof.

In accordance with the general rule, plaintiff in a penalty action against a railroad has the burden of proof,[23] and must establish every fact necessary to bring the case strictly within the statute.[24] If the railroad admits violation of a regulation[25] or if facts sufficient to show a prima facie violation are proved,[26] the burden shifts to the railroad to show other facts rendering its action lawful. The burden rests on the railroad to bring itself within the provisions of an exception to a penal statute[27] Under statutes imposing penalties for violation of separate requirements, it is not essential to prove violation of all requirements in order to recover.[28]

Admissibility. The usual rules respecting the admissibility of evidence in penal actions apply in actions for penalties brought against a railroad.[29]

Weight and sufficiency In a civil action against a railroad for a penalty, the courts ordinarily refuse to apply the rule of criminal law requiring proof against defendant beyond a reasonable doubt,[30] and hold that a preponderance of evidence is sufficient to establish liability.[31] It is, however, necessary to establish a violation of the statute by at least a preponderance of the evidence.[32] In determining whether there has been a violation of a penal statute the court will consider all the evidence,[33] and, in the last analysis, questions involving the sufficiency or insufficiency of evidence will depend on all the facts and circumstances involved.[34]

d. Trial and Review

The trial and review of an action against a railroad to recover a penalty are governed by the usual rules.

The usual rules of procedure relating to trials apply in actions to recover penalties for violation of regulations,[35] as, for example, with respect to instructions[36] Under the view that the proceedings are civil in their nature, it has been held proper to direct a verdict for plaintiff where the undisputed evidence shows the railroad's liability.[37] A summary instruction for defendant is properly refused where the evidence is insufficient to support it.[38] The verdict must be responsive to the issues.[39]

Review. The usual rule that a judgment will not be reversed on appeal for harmless error applies on review of a penalty action against a railroad.[40]

§ 444. Amount and Extent of Penalty

The amount of the penalty, within statutory limitations, rests in the sound discretion of the court; and under some statutes an accumulation of penalties may be recovered for each and every violation of a successive or continuing nature.

Within statutory limitations the amount of the penalty rests in the sound discretion of the court.[41] However, under a statute prescribing a fixed penalty for each violation of the act, the court has no discretion as to the amount of the penalty and must impose the amount called for by the statute.[42] An excessive penalty may not be imposed.[43] A statute making the servant violating certain regulations liable to a penalty within certain limits and the company also liable for "the like sum" subjects the company to a like degree of liability[44] and does not contemplate either a sum certain ascertained by a judgment against the offending servant[45] or the sum prescribed by the statute as a penalty for a single violation.[46]

Successive or continuing offenses In accordance with the rule of strict construction, it is held that, in the absence of a clear statutory intent to the contrary, successive violations of the statute render a railroad subject to only one penalty for acts prior to institution of the suit.[47] However, where the statute clearly so provides, an accumulation of penalties may be recovered for each and every violation.[48] Under a statute forbidding the use of a locomotive with a defective boiler, and imposing a specified penalty for each violation of the statute, each trip of a locomotive with the defective boiler constitutes a separate violation involving a separate penalty.[49] Where a statute provides that certain servants of the company shall be liable for a certain penalty "for each offense" and the corporation "for the like sum," the company is also liable for a penalty for each offense and not for the sum prescribed for a single violation.[50] Where a statute requiring certain accommodations and facilities at stations prescribes a penalty of a certain amount for each week the company fails to comply therewith, to be sued for by the county attorney, the company is liable for a cumulative penalty for each week but not for a separate penalty for each station within a county.[51]

Under the Federal Safety Appliance Act, any failure to comply with the requirements of the act subjects the railroad to penalty.[52] The hauling of each separate car without the prescribed appliances constitutes a separate violation of the act.[53] Two different movements of a defective car in the same train constitute one violation of the act.[54]

§ 445. Recovery of Penalty and Damages

The fact that a railroad is subject to a penalty ordinarily does not preclude an action for damages against it by the person injured as a result of the violation, but some statutes have been construed to require an election of remedies.

The fact that a wrongful act on the part of a railroad company is made the subject of a penalty does not prevent a person injured thereby from maintaining an action in tort for the damages sustained.[55] Where the statute imposes a penalty for the benefit of the "person aggrieved," any person sustaining an injury proximately due to the act prohibited may recover the penalty even though there was no actual collision.[56] Some statutes of this nature have been held to provide an election of remedies,[57] so that a judgment in an action for damages is a bar to an action for the penalty based on the same act of the railroad company whether the judgment be in favor of plaintiff,[58] or against him.[59] Under a statute providing that every railroad failing to remove dried vegetation from its right of way, in accordance with its statutory duty, shall incur a specified penalty "and be liable for all damages done," a person damaged by fire resulting from violation of the statute cannot recover the penalty.[60]

§ 446. Disposition of Proceeds

In the absence of constitutional restriction, the legislature may provide the disposition to be made of the penalty.

In the absence of constitutional restriction, the legislature may make whatever disposition of the penalty it may deem proper,[61] as by giving the entire penalty to the person injured,[62] or providing that a part shall go to the informer[63] or to the prosecuting attorney.[64]

E. DAMAGES FOR VIOLATION OF REGULATIONS

§ 447. In General

Damages may be recovered in a proper case for a railroad's violation of regulations, and where an absolute statutory liability is imposed plaintiff need not establish negligence on the part of the railroad or his own freedom from contributory negligence.

A statute imposing both a criminal liability and liability in damages for violation by a railroad of the statutory duties as to operation ordinarily does not make conviction under the criminal provision prerequisite to recovery under the damage provision.[65] Where the statute imposes an absolute liability in damages for violation of its provisions, neither the railroad's negligence[66] nor plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence[67] is essential to recovery. Provisions imposing liability for treble damages sustained in consequence of a violation of statute have been held to apply only to willful breaches of duty.[68]

§ 448. Delay Caused by Obstruction of Crossing

Recovery may be had in a proper case for damages suffered by delay proximately resulting from the unlawful obstruction of a crossing by railroad rolling stock, and such an action is governed by the usual rules with respect to pleading, evidence, and other rules of procedure.

A right of action lies for personal injuries sustained as the result of unlawful obstruction of a public crossing by railroad rolling stock,[69] as where a patient was injured by the delayed arrival of his physician,[70] or where a patient was injured by reason of delay in reaching his physician.[71] To entitle plaintiff to recover, it must appear that the road obstructed was a public one,[72] that it was obstructed for the length of time prohibited by regulation,[73] that the damages were the proximate result of the obstruction,[74] and that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.[75]

Accidental obstruction. In actions for damages for delay, obstruction statutes have been held inapplicable to an accidental obstruction.[76]

Pleading and evidence. The usual rules govern with respect to pleading in an action for damages for personal injury arising from delay caused by obstruction of a public crossing.[77] The burden of proof is on plaintiff to prove facts entitling him to punitive damages.[78] The usual rules control with respect to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence.[79]

Peremptory instruction. In accordance with general rules, the court should not give a peremptory instruction for defendant if there is sufficient evidence to support a verdict for plaintiff.[80]

Damages. The legislature may impose a fixed sum as damages for an obstruction delaying a traveler at a public crossing,[81] irrespective of actual damages suffered by the traveler,[82] provided it is not unreasonably great.[83] In accordance with general rules, punitive damages for injuries resulting from delay caused by obstruction of a crossing cannot be recovered in the absence of a willful or intentional act.[84] The usual rules govern with respect to the amount of damages.[85]

F. PROCEEDINGS TO COMPEL OPERATION AND FURNISHING FACILITIES

§ 449. In General

A railroad may be compelled by proper proceedings to perform its duties with respect to the operation of trains and the furnishing of facilities.

The performance of a railroad's duty to operate or furnish facilities may be compelled by proper proceedings instituted by the proper person or persons.[86] In general, the right to compel operation of a railroad lies in the state alone.[87] However, under statutory or constitutional provisions, a private person may have the right to institute proceedings through the state or a commission to compel the furnishing of facilities.[88] Under some statutes the commission can exercise its jurisdiction on its own motion.[89] Under statutes providing for enforcement of the orders of a board or commission relative to railroad operation by the courts on institution of proceedings at its request, no other person can maintain a suit to enforce such order.[90] Under some statutes the commission cannot authorize or require anything to be done with respect to repairs or equipment, its highest authority being to commence an action in court to require compliance with recommendations and suggestions.[91]

Nature and form of remedy. Remedies available against a railroad failing to operate or to furnish facilities include mandamus, as discussed in Mandamus § 231 d, injunction against discontinuance or decrease of service,[92] which is more readily granted than mandamus;[93] other suit in equity,[94] quo warranto,[95] receivership proceedings, as discussed supra § 377; proceedings by the state for forfeiture of the charter, as discussed supra § 18; prosecutions under criminal statutes, as discussed infra §§ 456-464, or under penal statutes, as discussed supra §§ 437-446; and, where such an action is authorized, an action for damages, as discussed supra §§ 447, 448. Specific performance will not lie to enforce a railroad's public duty to operate its road.[96] The court will not interfere to prevent a proposed discontinuance of train service where a commission is vested with exclusive jurisdiction over the matter in the first instance and is in the process of exercising such jurisdiction.[97]

§ 450. Proceedings Instituted in Court

General rules with respect to parties, questions of law and fact, judgment, and other matters govern court proceedings instituted to compel a railroad to operate and furnish facilities.

General rules govern court proceedings instituted to compel a railroad to comply with its duties to operate and furnish facilities, depending on the particular remedy available and chosen for the purpose.[98] On the issue of right to abandon a portion of a railroad because of alleged losses, the courts will not consider nonoperating items which would be no larger under operation than under abandonment.[99]

Parties. The usual rules apply with respect to parties in proceedings to compel a railroad to operate or to furnish facilities.[1] Under statutes giving a commission power over the operation and abandonment of railroads, and providing for action by the attorney general on a complaint by the commission, users of a railroad who have been damaged by its unauthorized abandonment have been held not proper parties plaintiff to a remedial proceeding.[2]

Questions of law. The reasonableness of a regulation of a board or commission has been held a question of law.[3]

Judgment or decree. The usual rules apply with respect to judgments and decrees in court proceedings to compel a railroad to operate or to furnish facilities.[4]

§ 451. Proceedings before Board or Commission

a In general
b Appeal from, or review of, order

a. In General

Proceedings before a board or commission to compel a railroad to comply with its duties to operate and furnish facilities are governed by general rules, as for example with respect to pleading, the trial or hearing, and the order or findings.

General rules apply in proceedings before a board or commission to compel a railroad to comply with its duties to operate and furnish facilities.[5] Under statutes empowering a board or commission to investigate failure of a railroad to perform its duties on its own motion or on complaint of an aggrieved party, the board or commission may proceed as to matters of operation and the furnishing of facilities with[6] or without[7] a formal complaint. Under statutes expressly providing for initiation of proceedings before a board or commission, to compel establishment of facilities at stations by petition, a petition is essential to jurisdiction of the commission to establish such facilities.[8] It is essential to review of its order by the courts that there be in the record either a sufficient complaint[9] or a sufficient statement of the facts on which a board or commission's order was based.[10]

Under some statutes, in proceedings instituted by a statement or complaint filed with the commission by an applicant, the statement or complaint should set forth the claims or charges on which the applicant relies and the relief sought,[11] and it should be served on the railroad company.[12] Likewise, where the commission institutes an investigation and on its own motion determines to conduct a hearing to ascertain and determine whether the railway company should be required to furnish devices or to change the grade at a railroad crossing, the commission may be required by statute to prepare and file a written specification of the issues which are to be considered and determined,[13] and may also be required to serve such writing on the railway company.[14] A motion before the board or commission to dismiss a petition for facilities, made by the railroad at the close of petitioner's case, may, on review by the courts, be treated as a demurrer to the pleading[15] and to the evidence[16]

Trial or hearing The railroad may be entitled to be heard before an order is made by board or commission directing it to furnish facilities[17] A notice of hearing must be served on the railway company where required by statute;[18] but a railroad which has appeared at a hearing as to the furnishing of facilities cannot complain of lack of notice.[19] Questions not within the scope of the particular proceeding will not be determined on a hearing before a board or commission.[20] Commissioners may properly make a personal investigation of physical conditions in order to understand the evidence submitted.[21]

Order and findings The order of a board or commission relative to operation or facilities should be sufficiently definite to indicate what is required.[22] An order is not necessarily invalidated by failure to put the report of experts into the record.[23] Failure of a board or commission's order to provide for review by the courts does not invalidate the order,[24] because the right of review exists apart from such provision.[25] The findings of the commission should be sufficient to constitute a basis for the order made by it,[26] but the use of particular words ordinarily is not required.[27] Where statutory provisions relative to notice are not violated, an order may be effective even though the commission's findings have not been filed[28]

b. Appeal from, or Review of, Order

In a proper case an appeal may be taken to the courts from an order of a board or commission relative to railroad operation and facilities On such an appeal the court will not consider matters outside the record or disturb an order which is not clearly erroneous.

In so far as an order of a board or commission relative to railroad operation and facilities violates the rights of the railroad, there is a right of appeal to the courts.[29] The right of appeal is limited to a party to the proceeding[30] and restricted to those portions of the order affecting appellant[31] On review the courts will not consider matters which are dehors the record[32] or which need not be determined[33] Where only one order of the commission, and on it only one issue, is presented for review, the jurisdiction of the court under some statutes does not extend to a determination of its separate divisions, but only to the decision of the commission as an integrated entity.[34]

In reviewing an order of public convenience and necessity the function of the court is to determine whether or not the order is arbitrary or unreasonable.[35] An order setting aside a railroad regulation is reviewable as to the reasonableness[36] and discriminatory character[37] of the regulation set aside. On review of an order to spend a specified sum in connection with erection of a depot, the issue of the reasonableness of such sum involves not only the depot, but also sidings and spur tracks.[38] Under statutes making construction of depots mandatory at all stations, the only issue on review of the reasonableness of the order of a board or commission for construction of a depot at a station is as to the amount directed to be expended.[39]

Waiver and estoppel. The railroad may, by waiver or estoppel, lose the right to urge certain objections on appeal.[40] A railroad has been held not precluded from appealing to the court from an order of the commission requiring the railroad to construct certain devices and to decrease the grade of a crossing because of the fact that the railroad did not apply for a continuance to obtain time to enable it to prepare its defense,[41] or because of a failure to request a rehearing after a decision was made[42] It has been held, in a proceeding to compel restoration of trains, that failure of people along the line to appear at a commission hearing and object to discontinuance of trains will be construed on review by the courts as an acquiescence therein.[43]

Determination. The order of a board or commission will not be disturbed by the courts on review unless clearly erroneous,[44] and the court will not substitute its judgment for that of the commission where there is any substantial basis in the evidence for the commission's findings.[45] Unless the action of the commission is beyond its jurisdiction, it findings are binding on the court in certiorari proceedings.[46] However, an order will be set aside on appeal, or its enforcement enjoined, if not supported by the record[47] In the absence of evidence that existing facilities are inadequate, a board or commission order for new and different facilities will not be sustained on review.[48]

The usual rules as to the admissibility of evidence, and the weight and sufficiency thereof, apply in proceedings to compel a railroad to operate or to furnish facilities. Orders of a board are presumed reasonable and the burden is on the railroad to show that an order is unreasonable.

In proceedings to compel operation and the furnishing of facilities, rules, regulations, or orders of a board or commission relative to operation and facilities ordinarily are presumed reasonable,[49] or at

Method and reasoning of commission

When the commission gives a fair hearing to railroad ordering it to restore discontinued passenger trains, receives and considers competent evidence that is offered, affords opportunity through evidence and argument to challenge the result, and makes its determination on evidence and not arbitrarily, the question for a federal court is not as to the mere correctness of the method and reasoning adopted by the commission but whether the order will result in confiscation.—Southern Ry. least not prima facie unreasonable,[50] and the burden rests on the railroad to show data proving the rule or order unreasonable.[51] Under statutes providing that the order of a board or commission shall be prima facie reasonable, the order of the board or commission as to furnishing of facilities is entitled to the same presumptive correctness as would attach to the findings of any other experts.[52] The burden of proof rests on a railroad to show a state of facts justifying discontinuance of operations.[53] A railroad company complaining of the constitutional invalidity of an order of the commission requiring certain service has the burden of showing that invalidity by convincing proof.[54]

a particular condition alleged to be unsafe because of close clearances between tracks is not conclusive that the condition is not dangerous.[62] The fact that at the time of the hearing before the commission no accidents had occurred as a result of the removal of switch lamps is not of itself proof that danger does not exist in the operation of trains without such lamps.[63]

G. DAMAGES FOR FAILURE TO OPERATE OR TO FURNISH FACILITIES

§ 453. Right of Action and Conditions Precedent

An action for damages may lie for a railroad's breach of a statutory or contractual duty to provide facilities, or for unlawful discrimination in the furnishing of facilities.

In the absence of statutory, constitutional, or contract provisions, no action for damages lies against a railroad for a mere failure to operate[64] or for a mere failure to furnish facilities;[65] at least no private individual may complain because of consequential damages from the refusal of a railroad to perform public or quasi-public duties unless the damages which he sustains are peculiar and different from those of other members of the public.[66] However, an action for damages may lie for a railroad's breach of a statutory duty to provide facilities.[67] In jurisdictions where a railroad is under a duty to give reasonable notice of intention to remove existing facilities, an action for damages lies for removal without such notice.[68] An action for damages for failure to furnish facilities will not lie in favor of one as to whom the road was not obligated to furnish the facility.[69]

Discrimination. An action may lie for unlawful discrimination in the furnishing of facilities;[70] and in such an action, where based on a refusal to furnish a siding connection, plaintiffs need not show what proportion of their shipments would have been sold within the state.[71]

Breach of contractual duty An action lies for damages occasioned by a railroad's breach of a contractual duty to provide facilities,[72] provided the contract[73] and its breach[74] are shown.

§ 454. Proceedings for Recovery

Actions for damages against a railroad for failure to furnish facilities are governed by the usual rules with respect to pleadings, evidence, and the like.

Proceedings for the recovery of damages for failure of a railroad to operate or to furnish facilities are governed by general rules.[75] A complaint for damages for failure to furnish facilities must set forth the facts necessary to show the existence of a cause of action[76] and resultant damage.[77] The usual rules govern as to admissibility[78] and sufficiency[79] of evidence in actions of the character under consideration. The usual rule that questions of fact are for the jury is applicable in actions against a railroad for damages arising from failure to operate or to furnish facilities.[80]

§ 455. —— Amount and Extent of Recovery

The amount and extent of the recovery in an action against a railroad for failure to furnish facilities depend on the particular circumstances involved.

A shipper entitled to notice of removal of existing facilities may recover damages for removal without notice to the extent that he was injured by the lack of notice [81] In an action for unlawful discrimination in the furnishing of siding facilities, the measure of damages is the difference between the market price actually received for goods after the discrimination ceased and the price which would have been received for such goods as could reasonably have been produced and shipped during the period of the discrimination [82]

In action for treble damages for failure to furnish a siding connection, damages should be computed on the number of cars to which plaintiff would have been entitled under defendant railroad's allotment of cars then in use,[83] and not on the basis of defendant's capacity as a shipper [84]

Damages recoverable for breach of contract to furnish facilities are such as could reasonably have been within the contemplation of the parties.[85]

H. CRIMINAL OFFENSES OF RAILROAD AND ITS AGENTS

§ 456. In General

a. In general
b. Wrongful death

a. In General

A railroad may be subject to criminal prosecution for violating its duties as to operation, and the validity of statutes making such violation an offense has been upheld.

Both at common law[86] and under statute[87] a railroad may be subject to criminal prosecution for violation of its duties respecting operation. A railroad may be indicted for the nonperformance of a statutory duty for which no punishment is specially provided under a general statute providing that in such cases the willful omission of any duty enjoined by law on any person holding a public trust or employment shall be punishable as a misdemeanor.[88] In some jurisdictions, by statute, a railroad company is guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine if it fails to provide suitable station facilities as required by the statute [89]

Validity of statutes imposing criminal liability on railroad companies for failure to perform duties incident to operation has been upheld,[90] as where a railroad is made criminally responsible for the misfeasance or nonfeasance of its agents [91] However, a criminal statute depriving defendant of the presumption of innocence,[92] or discriminatory in character,[93] has been held invalid. A statute making it an offense for a railroad company to fail to light its track in any city, but which fixes no standard as to the places for, or the kind of, lights, has been held void for uncertainty.[94]

Smoke Provisions making it an offense for a railroad to allow dense smoke to be discharged from its locomotives or buildings are aimed at preventing the continuous discharge or interval discharges of large volumes of smoke,[95] and they must be applied and construed reasonably [96] A municipality, by a penal provision prohibiting the discharge of dense smoke, cannot so restrict the use by a railroad of its locomotives as substantially to prevent the exercise of authority granted to the railroad by the legislature of the state.[97]

Willfulness. Under a statute making it a misdemeanor for a railroad employee willfully to violate or omit performance of his duty so as to endanger human life, defendant cannot be convicted if the element of willfulness is absent.[98] Under a statute making it a misdemeanor for any railroad employee to "refuse or neglect" to obey any railroad company rule whereby injury or death may result to any person, it is not necessary that the refusal or neglect be willful or intentional.[99]

Defenses. In general, defendant is entitled to show the facts and circumstances surrounding the alleged violation which might nullify a finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.[1] An intention to provide a facility or accommodation required by statute is no defense to a prosecution for failure to provide it.[2] Under a statute requiring railroads to provide privies at all depots, it is no defense to a prosecution for failure to do so that the depot was furnished voluntarily by the railroad[3] or that it lacked a reasonable time in which to comply with the statutory obligation.[4] Under statutes requiring provision of convenient and suitable waiting rooms,[5] or requiring station toilets to be kept in a sanitary condition,[6] the exercise of reasonable care has been held a valid defense to a prosecution for an alleged violation. Lack of authority to operate a railroad is no defense to a prosecution for violation of regulations affecting operation.[7]

b. Wrongful Death

(1) Manslaughter

In some jurisdictions a railroad corporation wrongfully causing the death of an individual may be criminally liable for manslaughter.

Under the view that a corporation may be guilty of manslaughter, a railroad corporation may be criminally liable therefor.[8] However, a road which has used due care in the selection and retention of employees is not criminally responsible for manslaughter resulting from their negligence,[9] nor can a manslaughter conviction be predicated on negligence deduced from the failure of the road to formulate rules for the guidance of employees in an unusual emergency.[10]

(2) Criminal Statutes Redressing Private Wrong

Under some statutes railroad companies are liable to indictment and fine for negligent injuries resulting in death, such an action, although criminal in form, being in effect a civil action for damages.

In some jurisdictions railroad companies are by statute made liable to indictment and fine for negligent injuries resulting in death, and the validity of such statutes has been upheld.[11] The purpose of such statutes is to obviate the common-law doctrine that no recovery lies for loss of a human life.[12] In order to sustain the action it must appear that the person for whose benefit the fine may be imposed is in existence,[13] that the railroad company was negligent,[14] and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the fatal injury.[15]

Nature of action. The action, although criminal in form, is in effect a civil action for damages.[16]

Contributory negligence on the part of decedent will defeat the action[17] unless too remote as a causative factor.[18]

Persons liable. Under a statute making "the proprietors of any railroad" subject to indictment for negligence causing death, the proprietor in fact may be indicted[19] The term "proprietor" as used in such statutes refers only to a railroad corporation,[20] and does not include individual stockholders thereof.[21] A road may be liable for death caused by trains operated by it, even though at the time running over private tracks of a third person[22]

Pleading and evidence. Prosecutions under such statutes are governed by rules applicable to criminal prosecutions as to pleading[23] and by rules applicable to civil actions as to evidence.[24]

§ 457. Obstructing Public Highways

Under some statutes it is an offense for a railroad to obstruct highways for more than a prescribed period of time except for specified purposes; and, even aside from statute, a railroad may be subject to indictment for maintaining a public nuisance by unreaonably obstructing a public highway.

Aside from statute, a railroad company is subject to indictment on the ground of creating and maintaining a public nuisance by unreasonably or unnecessarily obstructing a public highway,[25] although the obstruction be outside its right of way.[26] The frequent and rapid running of trains over a highway does not constitute a criminal nuisance.[27] However, the habitual running of trains across a highway at an unreasonable rate of speed and without giving reasonable signals of approach is a nuisance for which an indictment will lie.[28] In a common-law action for nuisance it is a good defense to show that the obstruction was necessarily incident to the proper operation of the road, and was not maintained for an unnecessary or unreasonable length of time.[29]

Abrogation of common-law remedy by statute. A statute imposing a penalty on railroad agents who obstruct a highway has been held to supersede the common-law remedy by indictment[30] Notwithstanding statutes defining the rights and duties of railroads whose tracks cross a public road with respect to the nature and extent of the physical structure built, but not undertaking to define or prescribe what shall constitute a proper use thereof, the road may be prosecuted for a common-law nuisance in connection with a use obstructing the public road.[31]

Under statute. In some jurisdictions, by virtue of statute, it is an indictable offense for a railroad company to obstruct streets or highways, or to do so for over a certain length of time, except for specified purposes[32] Under a statute prohibiting a railroad from negligently or unnecessarily obstructing "a highway, town way or street," a railroad cannot be convicted for obstruction of a private way.[33] A statute making it an offense to put obstructions in a passway has been held not to apply to a railroad's obstruction of a private crossing, in the exercise of its corporate franchise, by permitting cars to stand on the track over the crossing.[34] Where a statute and ordinance prescribe different periods of time as rendering the company liable for the obstruction of a highway, the ordinance is void in so far as it conflicts with the statute,[35] and the company will be liable for obstructing a crossing for the time prescribed by the statute, although it is a period shorter than that prescribed by the ordinance.[36] Under a statute imposing criminal liability on a railroad for obstruction of a street for a period longer than prescribed by an ordinance of the municipality in which located, the railroad is guilty of no offense in obstructing a street within a municipality lacking an obstruction ordinance.[37]

Intent or accident; violation of instructions. Under a statute absolutely prohibiting the obstruction of a highway for over a specified length of time, defendant may be convicted for an accidental obstruction[38] which could not have been avoided by the use of reasonable care,[39] or for an obstruction due to the malicious but preventable interference of strangers,[40] and despite the absence of a guilty intent.[41] Neither at common law nor under statute is it any defense that the railroad's servants or agents, in causing the obstruction, acted contrary to the rules or instructions of the company, provided they were acting within the scope of their employment,[42] although there is authority to the contrary with respect to a single instance of disobedience.[43] A railroad executive cannot be held liable for obstruction of the highway by subordinates in violation of his instructions.[44]

§ 458. Intoxication of Employee While on Duty

It is sometimes made an offense for a railroad employee having to do with the movement of trains to be intoxicated while on duty.

Under a statute making it a criminal offense for a railroad employee "having to do with the movement of trains" to be intoxicated while on duty, an employee reporting for and attempting to work is on duty within the meaning of the statute.[45] The test of whether a given employee is within the statute is the nature of the duties he might be called on to perform.[46]

§ 459. Persons Liable

The determination of which railroad, officer, or agent is criminally responsible for a violation of regulations depends on the terms of the statutes and the particular circumstances of the case.

A railroad company is not liable for criminal offenses committed by a second railroad company while operating the lines of the first as an independent agency.[47] Under a statute expressly making both the railroad company and a participating agent guilty of a misdemeanor for violation of its provisions, the railroad cannot escape liability on the plea that the agent alone is responsible.[48] Under a statute expressly subjecting a railroad employee to fine for violating its provisions, and silent as to the liability of the railroad, the road cannot be prosecuted for a violation.[49] Under statutes making particular officers or agents subject to indictment for certain acts or omissions, an indictment will lie only against the particular officer or agent specified.[50]

Under a statute in one section making it a misdemeanor for any "person" to set fire to forests, and in a different section making it a crime for a railroad to neglect fire regulations therein prescribed, a railroad company cannot be indicted as a "person" under the first section.[51] Under a statute forbidding the heating of cars by stones kept inside the car, and providing that violation of the statute shall be a misdemeanor, any corporation[52] or person[53] participating in a violation of the act may be indicted.

§ 460. —— Operation by Receiver

A railroad ordinarily is not criminally responsible for an offense committed while the road is under the control of a receiver; but the receiver may be responsible, at least in his individual capacity.

A railroad company cannot be convicted for offenses incident to the operation of its road occurring while the road is being controlled and operated by a receiver,[54] except, according to some authority, in a case where the statutory duty could have been performed by the company without interfering with the receiver[55] A railroad company may be convicted of offenses occurring prior to the time when the receiver went into possession[56]

Liability of receiver. There is authority to the effect that a receiver may be indicted for offenses incident to the operation of the road occurring during his control thereof,[57] at least in his individual capacity.[58]

§ 461. Prosecution and Punishment

The rules governing the indictment, information, or complaint in a prosecution against a railroad company are considered infra § 462, evidence, trial, and review infra § 463, and punishment infra § 464

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 462. —— Indictment, Information, or Complaint

The indictment, information, or complaint in a prosecution against a railroad company must allege facts sufficient to constitute the offense charged and should be sufficiently certain; but mere surplusage does not render it defective.

The form of the prosecution's initial pleading will depend on statutory or constitutional provisions as interpreted in the light of general rules[59] An indictment, information, or complaint against a railroad company must allege every fact necessary to constitute the offense charged[60] and to show the liability of defendant.[61] Where the duty of the railroad to perform an act is predicated on some prior affirmative action of the public authorities, the indictment should allege the taking of such action[62]

Certainty. The indictment, information, or complaint must be sufficiently certain to enable defendant to prepare his defense and to make a judgment rendered thereon available as a bar to another prosecution;[63] but if it meets the foregoing requirement the pleading is sufficient as to certainty[64] In an indictment for failing to give the statutory crossing signals, it is sufficient to describe the place of such omission as the crossing of a public highway without alleging when or by what authority it was established;[65] but the indictment should specify which of defendant's trains committed the alleged offense where different trains were operated at the place on the day specified[66] An indictment charging discrimination in the accommodations provided must allege wherein the discrimination existed[67]

Description of defendant. In an indictment against a railroad company it is a sufficient allegation of defendant's corporate existence to state the name of the company, and that it is a corporation existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state, duly organized and doing business.[68] Where the indictment is against a receiver, an averment that he is the receiver of, and as such is operating a certain railroad is a sufficient averment of authority from the court appointing him to operate the road[69] Where the statute makes only a particular officer or agent liable to indictment, the indictment must show that defendant is the officer or agent specified by the statute.[70]

70. Ga.—Vaughan v. State, 43 S.E 249, 116 Ga. 841.

Language of statute. In accordance with general rules, an indictment against a railroad or its employees which substantially follows the language of the statute creating the offense is sufficient,[71] although not using the exact statutory language,[72] unless the statute fails completely to define the crime, in which case the necessary additional facts to show the offense must be set forth.[73] Where the statute requires either the ringing of a bell "or" the blowing of a whistle, an indictment alleging in the conjunctive that it failed to do the one "and" the other does not show the commission of an offense.[74] An indictment for failure to provide separate coaches for the transportation of white and colored passengers is sufficient if it sets out the facts constituting the offense in the words of the statute and contains sufficient averments as to time, place, persons, and other circumstances to identify the particular transaction.[75]

Surplusage does not render an indictment defective.[76]

Bill of particulars cannot cure an indictment so defective that it charges no offense.[77]

Issues, proof, and variance. Each material allegation of the indictment, information, or complaint must be supported by proof,[78] and any material variance is fatal to a recovery.[79] The state need not prove an allegation supported by an uncontradicted presumption.[80] Under an indictment for one offense defendant cannot be convicted of a different offense.[81] Where time is not of the essence of the offense, it need not be proved as alleged,[82] but the offense may be proved to have been committed at any time prior to the finding of the indictment and within the period prescribed by the statute of limitations.[83]

§ 463. —— Evidence, Trial, and Review

a. Evidence
b. Trial and review

a. Evidence

As in other prosecutions, the railroad is entitled to the presumption of innocence and the state has the burden of proof. The usual rules govern with respect to the admissibility of evidence and the weight and sufficiency thereof.

In accordance with general rules, a railroad company being prosecuted for a criminal offense is entitled to the presumption of innocence,[84] and the burden of proof rests on the state.[85] Criminal intent may be presumed from habitual violation of a regulatory statute.[86]

Admissibility. In accordance with general principles, evidence in a criminal prosecution against a railroad or its employees must be competent, material, and relevant,[87] and have some legitimate bearing on the question of defendant's guilt or innocence of the offense charged;[88] and under the circumstances of particular cases evidence has been held admissible[89] or inadmissible,[90] depending on the application of such principles. On an indictment for obstructing a highway, where each obstruction constitutes a separate offense, the prosecution should be required to elect which offense it will prosecute for, and the evidence should be limited to that offense.[91]

Weight and sufficiency. General rules govern questions of weight and sufficiency of evidence in criminal prosecution of a railroad or its employees for offenses incident to the operation of the road.[92]

b. Trial and Review

The usual rules of criminal law are applicable to the trial and review of prosecutions of railroads or their employees for offenses relative to the operation of the road.

In the trial of railroads or their employees for offenses relative to operation of the road, the usual rules of criminal law are applicable.[93] In accordance with general rules, questions of fact are for the jury on conflicting evidence.[94] The validity of a statute under which a railroad is prosecuted is a question of law for the court.[95]

Instructions are satisfactory if they present the law and the facts properly when considered as a whole.[96] Inconsistent or contradictory instructions are improper.[97]

Review. General rules govern the review of criminal prosecutions against a railroad or its employees for offenses relative to operation of the road.[98]

§ 464. —— Punishment

A statute subjecting a railroad to imprisonment and fine may be valid as to the fine and inoperative as to the imprisonment feature.

A statute in terms imposing imprisonment and fine as punishment for violation has been held inoperative as to railroads with respect to the imprisonment feature,[99] but nevertheless valid as to the fine.[1]

III. INJURIES TO PROPERTY IN GENERAL

A. INJURIES FROM CONSTRUCTION OR MAINTENANCE

§ 465. Existence and Extent of Liability in General

The fact that a railroad company owns its right of way absolutely does not affect its liability for damages to the property of others caused by the negligent or improper manner of constructing its road or by improper encroachments upon the land outside the limits of its right of way.

The fact that a railroad company owns its right of way absolutely does not affect its liability for damages to the property of others caused by the negligent or improper manner of constructing its road[2] or by improper encroachments upon the land outside the limits of its right of way.[3]

Effect of assessment of damages in condemnation proceedings. Where land has been condemned for the construction of a railroad and damages have been assessed in the condemnation proceeding, the landowner may not thereafter recover damages for injuries merely incidental to the construction of the road if done in a lawful and proper manner,[4] since, as discussed in Eminent Domain § 149, the damages assessed in the condemnation proceeding include whatever of injury results to the landowner from the structure itself and such as is incidental to its use. On the other hand, the damages are assessed on the theory that the road will be constructed in a skillful and proper manner,[5] and, since so limited, the landowner may subsequently recover damages

for any injury due to a negligent or improper construction of the road,[6] or improper encroachment upon his lands outside of the right of way,[7] or failure to comply with a statutory requirement, such as the construction of fences or cattle guards,[8] even though the injury results from some new use made by plaintiff of his property after the construction of the road, provided such use is a reasonable and customary one,[9] and although plaintiff was not the owner of the land at the time the railroad was built.[10]

§ 466. —— Effect of Authorization or Consent to Construction

The constitutional right of a person whose property is taken or injured without his consent for public purposes to compensation therefor is not affected by legislative authority given to a railroad company to construct a road or by municipal consent given to such a company to construct a road within the corporate limits.

The constitutional right of a person whose property is taken or injured without his consent for public purposes to compensation therefor is not affected by legislative authority given to a railroad company to construct a road[11] or by municipal consent given to such a company to construct a road within the corporate limits.[12] On the other hand, where a railroad company in constructing its road has proceeded under legislative authority and in a lawful and proper manner, with due care, there may be no recovery as for a tort for any incidental or consequential damages,[13] although the legislative authority which protects the company against such liability for merely incidental damages does not authorize any direct invasion of private rights,[14] so that a railroad company may be held liable for damages caused by unauthorized acts[15] or by any encroachment upon lands by it outside of the limits of its right of way.[16]

Inasmuch as a railroad company, in constructing or maintaining its road, must exercise ordinary care for the protection of the rights of property owners,[17] such a company may be held liable for any injuries to property caused by the negligent or improper manner of constructing or maintaining its road,[18] and the general rule applies that it must so use its property as not unnecessarily to injure another.[19] However, this rule does not require that where the company has acquired a right of way it must construct its road thereon in such manner as to occasion the least possible injury to the owners of adjacent lands, regardless of its own interests and the requirements of a properly constructed roadbed.[20]

§ 467. —— Release, Waiver, or Estoppel

A valid contract executed by a landowner releasing a railroad company from all damages which will result from the construction and maintenance of its road ordinarily is binding on the landowner and on those claiming under him. A landowner may, by reason of estoppel, be prevented from recovering damages for the taking of his property for the construction of a railroad.

of the contract[23] However, a contract of this nature should be construed and given effect according to the intent of the parties as revealed by the terms thereof,[24] and a release of all damages caused by the construction and maintenance of a railroad does not contemplate or prevent a recovery for injuries resulting from a negligent or improper construction or maintenance.[25] Furthermore, a contract seeking to exempt a railroad company from liability for all subsequent and future risk and damages of every kind resulting from the negligent maintenance of the road has been held void.[26]

A mere parol license given to a railroad company by a landowner to divert water upon his lands may be revoked by a subsequent grantee and damages may be recovered for injuries accruing subsequent to such revocation.[27] Also the consent of a landowner to the construction of a railroad through his premises has been held not to constitute a waiver of a statutory duty of the company to construct fences or cattle guards.[28]

Estoppel. In a proper case, a landowner may, by reason of his acts or conduct, be estopped to recover damages for the taking of his property by a railroad company for the construction of its road,[29] as where he verbally agrees to convey a right of way without charge, and the railroad company relying on his promise and without objection on his part constructs its road,[30] or where he permits a railroad company to excavate a tunnel on his land without objection until after the tunnel is completed and the railroad is constructed through it.[31] However, in order that a landowner may be prevented by reason of estoppel from recovering damages to his property caused by the construction of a railroad, all the elements necessary to constitute an estoppel must be present.[32] Thus mere silence on the part of a landowner, not inducing action or misleading the railroad company, does not estop him to claim damages resulting from a construction of the road in a manner different from that contemplated by a waiver of damages which the landowner has entered into.[33]

A lot owner in a city is not estopped to recover damages to his property caused by the negligent or improper manner of constructing a railroad in a street by having signed a petition to the city authorities to grant the company a right of way through the street,[34] or by having been a member of the city council and voted in favor of granting the right of way,[35] or by having consented to the construction of a new sidewalk to take the place of one removed to make room for the alterations in the street made necessary by the railroad.[36]

§ 468. Particular Injuries

The liability of a railroad company for various injuries to property occurring in connection with the construction and maintenance of its road is discussed infra §§ 469–472.

§ 469. —— Occupation or Obstruction of Streets and Highways Generally

An abutting property owner may be entitled to sue for and recover damages sustained to his property where the use of a street or a highway for railroad purposes is regarded to be such as to entitle him to compensation, or where the particular use or acts done by a railroad company constitute an injury to his property for which he is entitled to be compensated and there has been no condemnation or compensation made, without proof of negligence in the manner of doing the work.

An abutting property owner may be entitled to sue for and recover damages sustained to his property where the use of a street or highway for railroad purposes is regarded as such as to entitle him to compensation, or where the particular use or acts done by a railroad company constitute an injury to his property for which he is entitled to be compensated, and there has been no condemnation or compensation made,[37] without proof of negligence in the manner of doing the work.[38] On the other hand, the right to recover damages may depend on the manner in which the road is constructed, as where the construction of the road does not of itself entitle an abutting property owner to compensation,[39] so that, in such a case, if the work done has been duly authorized and the railroad company has proceeded in a legal and proper manner, there can be no recovery for merely incidental or consequential damages suffered by an abutting property owner.[40]

A railroad company may be held liable for all damages sustained by an abutting property owner where it has constructed its road in a street or highway without authority,[41] or where it has constructed its road in an unauthorized manner,[42] and generally for injuries resulting from a negligent or improper mode of construction,[43] or for injuries resulting from a failure to comply with statutory requirements;[44] but a railroad company may not be held liable for damages resulting from works of construction, although incidental to the construction of a railroad, which were done by municipal or other public authorities, and over which the railroad company had no control.[45]

Where a municipality grants a railroad company a right of way through its streets on the express condition that the company shall pay all damages to property owners which shall result from the construction of the road, the company may be held liable therefor,[46] and a property owner may be entitled to recover for damages done during the process of construction as well as for that caused by the construction of the road when completed.[47] So also, where a charter provision requires a railroad company to pay "all damages that may arise to any person," from the construction of the road, the company may be held liable for damages so caused, although there is not a taking of plaintiff's property within the application of the constitutional provision relating to the making of compensation in such cases.[48]

§ 470. —— Failure to Construct Fences and Cattle Guards

As a rule, in the absence of a duty to fence its track or to construct cattle guards, a railroad company may not be held liable for injuries to adjoining lands occasioned by their absence, and if such a company has voluntarily constructed fences and cattle guards it may not be held liable for injuries to property resulting from a failure to maintain or keep them in repair.

As a rule, in the absence of a duty to fence its track or to construct cattle guards, a railroad company may not be held liable for injuries to adjoining lands occasioned by their absence,[49] such as injuries to crops or pastures by trespassing animals,[50] and if such a company has voluntarily constructed fences and cattle guards it may not be held liable for injuries to property resulting from a failure to maintain or keep them in repair.[51] Moreover, under a statute expressly requiring railroad companies to construct fences or cattle guards, the right to recover for damages to property occasioned by their failure to do so depends on the purpose of the requirement;[52] and if the design of such a statute is not to protect an adjacent landowner but merely to protect the railroad and insure the safety of passengers and trains thereon, or to prevent animals from coming upon the track and being injured, a railroad company may not be held liable for injuries to crops or pastures by trespassing animals.[53] So also, where a statute imposing the duty expressly provides the liability

Where, on the other hand, the statute is for the benefit of adjoining landowners and its application is not restricted to particular injuries, such a landowner may be entitled to recover for any injury which is a natural and proximate result of the omission of such duty,[55] or of a failure subsequently to keep the fences or cattle guards in repair,[56] such as for the destruction of, or injury to, his crops[57] or to his pastures [58] Under such a statute a landowner may also be entitled to recover damages for the diminution of the value of the use of his land owing to the absence of fences or cattle guards[59] or for the deprivation of the use of a pasture.[60]

Under a statute imposing liability for double damages for all damage done by reason of any animals escaping from, or coming upon, land by reason of the failure of a railroad company to construct and maintain fences and cattle guards, a property owner may be entitled to recover double damages from a railroad company for the failure of the company to fence, if his land is not separated from the land which adjoins the railroad company's right of way by a lawful fence, or if there is no lawful fence between his land and the right of way,[61] and, under such a statute, a railroad company may be held liable for damages done by stock escaping from its right of way upon adjoining lands, whether the latter are inclosed or unin-closed.[62] Where the statute requires a railroad company, whose road passes through a field, to maintain a cattle guard at the points of entering such field, the road is required to place cattle guards at cross fences, although both sides are in use by the same person,[63] and hence a person may be entitled to recover damages to crops caused by his own cattle escaping from one inclosure to another over a defective guard.[64]

§ 471. —— Obstruction or Diversion of, or Interference with, Waters and Watercourses

Under some statutory provisions a railroad company may be held liable for property damages resulting from the obstruction or diversion of, or interference with, waters and watercourses by the construction and maintenance of its embankments, bridges, and other works.

Under the provisions of a statute requiring a railroad company to construct and maintain suitable openings and drains to afford a sufficient outlet to drain and carry off the water of watercourses and surface water, a railroad company may be held liable for an injury to land from an overflowing caused by its obstruction of the channel of a watercourse.[65] Liability for property damages, under such statutory provisions, may be predicated on the maintenance by a railroad company of an inadequate bridge across a watercourse,[66] as well as on the original construction of an inadequate bridge,[67] but, under such provisions, a railroad company may not be held liable for damages resulting from an unprecedented and overwhelming flood.[68]

By virtue of some statutory provisions, a railroad company may be held liable for property damages resulting from its failure properly to construct and maintain lateral ditches along the road-

bed in order to accommodate and dispose of the water of watercourses and surface waters.[69] Under such statutory provisions, a railroad company may be held liable to a landowner for damages resulting from its failure properly to maintain and clean a ditch even though, if it did so, the water would be directed onto the land of another.[70] Moreover, the fact that a railroad company lacks a sufficient right of way to build a drainage ditch, as required by statute, has been held not to excuse its failure to do so.[71]

Under statutes expressly requiring that a railroad company, in the construction of its road, provide for the accommodation and disposal of the water of watercourses and surface waters, a railroad company may be held liable for damages to landowners occasioned by its failure to make such provision,[72] as, for example, by its failure to construct sufficient culverts and sluices for drainage purposes.[73] Under such a statute a railroad company may not be held liable for property damage caused by an unprecedented flood which a person of ordinary care could not have anticipated, provided the structure placed by it over the stream does not obstruct the natural and ordinary flow of the stream,[74] although it may be held liable for damages resulting from its negligence in constructing and maintaining a structure over a stream where such negligence concurs with a flood, notwithstanding the flood is extraordinary and unprecedented.[75]

Statutes requiring railroad companies to construct their roads across watercourses so as not to interfere with the free use thereof and requiring that the company shall restore the stream or watercourse to its former state, or in a manner sufficient not unnecessarily to impair its usefulness, have been construed as merely declaratory of the common-law duty.[76] Thus, under such a statute, a railroad company may not be held liable to landowners for property damages in the absence of negligence,[77] but it may be held liable for damages resulting from its negligence,[78] or from its failure to comply with the statute,[79] and, under such a statute, the mere fact that a flood is unprecedented in volume and extent may not relieve the railroad company from the dam-

What constitutes negligence
(1) Railroad embankment, if so constructed and maintained as not to constitute nuisance per se, was not negligently constructed.—Heckaman v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 20 P.2d 258, 93 Mont. 363.

(2) Railroad existing by authority of law and crossing natural watercourse was not nuisance per se, and fact that railroad had grade and maintained culverts across channel was not negligence if constructed and maintained in conformity with statutory requirements.—Peel v. Chicago, M., St. P. & P. R. Co., 22 P.2d 617, 94 Mont. 334, followed in Spreitzer v. Chicago, M., St. P. & P. R. Co., 22 P.2d 620, 94 Mont. 344.

ages resulting from its breach of duty,[80] although if such a company fully discharges its statutory duty it may not be held liable for damages resulting from the insufficiency of openings to carry away the waters of an unprecedented flood.[81]

Under some statutory provisions the failure of a railroad company to restore a stream crossed by its road to its original usefulness has been held to constitute actionable negligence.[82] So, where a railroad company constructs and maintains culverts and bridges which are, in fact, insufficient properly to provide for the passage of waters reasonably to be expected, it violates the statute, and may be held liable for the damages resulting from such violation as for negligence per se,[83] but if the culverts are reasonably sufficient for a reasonably expected flow the company may not be held liable for failure to reinforce them.[84] Such a statute, it has been held, does not in itself impose any liability to an adjoining landowner for the obstruction of the flow of surface waters,[85] and it has further been held that a railroad company is not liable for the flooding of lands where it constructs its embankment and bridge in accordance with the specifications of a drainage district, to the control of which it was subject.[86]

The common-law liability of a railroad company for injuries resulting from the obstruction of natural watercourses by the construction of embankments, bridges, and other works, and by the obstruction of the natural flow or drainage of surface waters is considered in the C.J.S. Title Waters § 20, also 67 C.J. p 704 note 66-p 709 note 11.

§ 472. —— Miscellaneous Injuries

a. In general
b. Destruction of fences
c. Injuries from blasting

a. In General

The courts have passed on the liability of a railroad company for various injuries to property occurring in connection with the construction or maintenance of its road.

The courts have passed on the liability of a railroad company for various injuries to property occurring in connection with the construction or maintenance of its road.[87] Thus a railroad company may be held liable for resulting property damages where it negligently so constructs its road that soil or other waste material is cast upon adjoining land to its injury.[88] Also, where a railroad enters upon property without right and injures it by the deposit of material, it may become liable as a trespasser.[89] While a property owner may be entitled to recover from a railroad company for special or peculiar injuries to his property resulting from the change of the grade of a highway or street through the construction of a railroad,[90] under circumstances wherein the change of grade might have been made by the public authorities without an attendant right of the property owners to compensation, it has been held that a railroad company may, without liability, make such a change where it proceeds without negligence and under proper authorization.[91]

Loss of railroad facilities. Where a railroad company has relocated its tracks under a power and au-

(2) However, where railroad company builds sidetrack on its own right of way, it has been held that it is not liable for depreciation in value of property of adjoining landowner resulting from obstruction of access by such track.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Moore, 7 Tenn. App. 319.

thority conferred by the general law, no right of action may arise in favor of an abutting property owner who, in consequence of the relocation, has suffered a diminution or loss of his ability to connect his property by switches or otherwise with the railroad tracks as theretofore existing.[92] Moreover, the fact that a railroad company has fenced its right of way, thereby rendering a certain sidetrack inaccessible from plaintiff's property has been held not to support an action for the diminution of the value of his property because of the loss of such facilities where such company has left ample depot facilities at its station.[93]

Removal of lateral support. Where a railroad company has rightfully acquired a right of way, it may not be held liable where an excavation made by it, without negligence in the proper construction of its road, deprives adjacent land of lateral support,[94] and it has been held not incumbent on it to build walls to prevent the falling of the banks of the cut.[95] However, where the construction of the road by the removal of lateral support creates a direct and physical injury to adjoining property, for which compensation has not been made, it has been held that a recovery of damages may be had therefor.[96]

b. Destruction of Fences

While a railroad company has been held to have the right to make openings in existing fences which intersect its right of way for the purpose of constructing its road, it has also been held that, where a railroad company is required to fence or construct cattle guards, if it does not do so at the time it opens up its right of way through the inclosures of the landowner, it must provide other adequate means of protection.

In determining whether or not a railroad company is liable for injuries to property occurring in connection with the construction or maintenance of its road, it has been held that a railroad company has a right to make openings in existing fences which intersect its right of way for the purpose of constructing its road,[97] but that, where a railroad company is required to fence or construct cattle guards, if it does not do so at the time it opens up its right of way through the inclosures of the landowner, it must provide other adequate means of protection,[98] and that if it does not it may be held liable for a resulting injury to crops.[99]

Where a railroad company has acquired the right to construct its road through certain lands, it has been held not liable for the acts of a contractor for construction or his servants in tearing down fences[1] or leaving open gates or bars.[2] However, the rule has been held to be otherwise where such acts are done before the railroad company has acquired the right to enter and construct its road upon such lands,[3] and it has further been held that a railroad company may not delegate to a contractor its statutory duty of fencing so as to escape liability for the nonperformance of such duty.[4] If a landowner constructs his fences upon the railroad right of way the company may, when necessary, remove them, provided it does no unnecessary damage in so doing.[5]

c. Injuries from Blasting

A railroad company may be held liable for injuries to lands, buildings, or property of an adjacent landowner resulting from negligence in the manner of blasting done by the company in connection with the construction or maintenance of its road.

With respect to the liability of a railroad company for injuries to property occurring in connection with the construction or maintenance of its road, although a railroad company in constructing its road may have a lawful right to excavate by means of blasting whenever necessary to do so,[6] such a company may be held liable for injuries to the lands, buildings, or property of an adjacent landowner resulting from negligence in the manner of blasting.[7] Although it has been held that a railroad company is liable for all injuries caused by its blasting regardless of the degree of care employed in doing the work,[8] it has also been held that such a company is not liable in the absence of negligence,[9] but that the degree of care should be proportionate to the danger of injury[10] and that whether due care under the circumstances has been exercised ordinarily is a question of fact for the jury[11]

While a railroad company has been held not liable in the absence of negligence for the mere throwing of rock by blasting upon adjacent lands,[12] it has been held liable for the resulting damage if it fails to remove such rock within a reasonable time.[13] A railroad company may also be liable for using a blast where injury is likely to result, and it is practicable to remove the rock without blasting,[14] or for using blasts of unnecessary power[15]

§ 473. Proximate Cause

In order to impose liability on a railroad company for an injury to property occurring in connection with the construction or maintenance of its road, the alleged wrongful act of the company must have been the proximate cause of the injury.

In order to impose liability on a railroad company for an injury to property occurring in connection with the construction or maintenance of its road, the alleged wrongful act of the company must have been the proximate cause of the injury.[16] While it is sufficient that the injury occasioned by the wrongful act is one which might reasonably have been anticipated as the natural and probable result thereof,[17] it is not necessary that the particular injury suffered should have been foreseen,[18] since it is only required that a reasonably prudent person should have foreseen that injury was likely to flow from the wrongful act.[19]

The act or omission causing the injury must be one for which the railroad company and not some third person or entity is responsible,[20] but the mere fact that it is difficult to determine what part of the damage complained of was occasioned by the act of defendant and what part by another agency has been held not fatal to plaintiff's case.[21] Where an act of God alone would not produce the injury, but, assuming there has been an act of God, the loss is made possible by reason of a prior, coincident, or subsequent negligent act on the part of a railroad company, the company may be held liable therefor.[22] So, where the failure of a railroad company to comply with a statute is an efficient or proximate cause of an injury, the company may be held liable therefor although there is also another concurring and efficient cause, such as an act of God, for which it is not responsible.[23]

§ 474. Contributory Negligence

In actions to recover for injuries to property based on the negligence or omission of a statutory duty by a railroad company with respect to the construction or maintenance of its road, a recovery may be precluded by the contributory negligence of the person injured or damaged.

In actions to recover for injuries to property based on the negligence or omission of a statutory duty by a railroad company with respect to the construction or maintenance of its road, a recovery may, as in other cases, be precluded by the contributory negligence of the person injured or damaged,[24] since it is the duty of a person to exercise ordinary care in protecting his property against injury from such causes if he can do so with moderate or slight trouble or expense[25] On the other hand, one may not be required to incur any large amount of trouble or expense for such purpose,[26] nor may one be required to abandon or forgo the ordinary and proper uses of his property because of the negligent acts or omissions of a railroad company.[27] Moreover, one may not be required to anticipate, in planning a particular use of his property, that a railroad company will not, at the proper time, perform its duty.[28]

It has been held not to constitute contributory negligence, where a railroad company has failed to construct fences or cattle guards, for a landowner to turn his stock into a pasture from which they may escape to his cultivated lands and injure his crops, by reason of the absence of such fences or cattle guards,[29] or to plant a crop which, because of the absence of such fences or cattle guards, would be exposed to depredations of stock,[30] particularly where he has reason to believe that the railroad company will perform such duty by the time the protection to be afforded thereby will be needed.[31] So, also, the failure of a landowner to avail himself of a statutory authority to construct fences or cattle guards, on failure of a railroad company to do so, and recover their cost, has been held not contributory negligence which will bar his right to recover for injuries occasioned by the failure of the railroad company to do so,[32] and the same rule has been held to apply under similar statutes relating to the construction of private or farm crossings.[33]

§ 475. Persons Entitled to Sue

In order to be entitled to sue for injuries to property occurring in connection with the construction or maintenance of a railroad, the plaintiff must have title to the property sufficient to sustain the action.

In order to be entitled to sue for injuries to property occurring in connection with the construction or maintenance of a railroad, plaintiff must have title to the property sufficient to sustain the action[34] However, the title of plaintiff may be sufficient to sustain an action for damages, although it is not such as is required to be shown to sustain trespass to try title.[35] While a right of action for damages to property where the damage accrues directly from, and immediately on, the construction of the road may not pass to a grantee of the land,[36] where the damage accrues after the construction as a consequence of the negligent or improper mode of construction, a person owning the property at the time of the injury may be entitled to recover therefor, although he did not own it when the road was constructed,[37] and even though he bought the property with knowledge of the existing conditions[38]

If a statute imposing a duty or liability on a railroad company limits such duty or liability to a particular class of persons, only such persons as are within the application of the statute may sue[39] However, under a statute providing that a railroad company shall be liable for all damages caused by its failure to provide for drainage, it has been held that the right of action for damages is not limited to adjoining landowners,[40] and that one not an adjoining landowner may be entitled to bring an action,[41] so that one whose lands lie upstream and across the river from the embankment of a railroad company may be entitled to sue under such statute.[42]

A person may not be entitled to maintain a private action for a mere obstruction of a street or highway by which he is injured only as a member of the public generally,[43] as where, although he may be an abutting landowner, the damage he suffers is the same in kind as others sustain,[44] and he is not affected as to his right of ingress to, and egress from, his property, but only as to his use of the street or highway in common with the rest of the public,[45] in that he is able to use other streets which are less convenient.[46] On the other hand, if he sustains a special injury different from that of the public generally he may be entitled to recover therefor.[47] Also, an abutting owner may be entitled to maintain an action for damages for a violation of the conditions, made for his benefit, in an ordinance under which the railroad company occupies the street.[48]

a. In General

The general rules governing civil actions apply to an action against a railroad company to recover damages arising from negligent or improper construction or maintenance of the road. Where the lawful construction of a railroad causes an injury to property of a permanent character, the entire damage, past, present, and future, resulting therefrom should be sued for and recovered in one action, although, if the injury results from a negligent or improper construction, the plaintiff may be entitled to sue for the damages already sustained and maintain successive actions as often as a new injury occurs.

In accordance with the general rules governing civil actions, where property has been injured by the reason of the negligent or improper construction of a railroad, the proper remedy has been held to be an action at law for damages and not by proceedings for an assessment of damages under the statutes relating to condemnation.[49] Also, where property has not been entered upon but has been injured by the construction of a railroad, and no remedy is provided by statute, an action at law to recover the damages sustained has been held to be the proper remedy.[50] It has further been held that the proper form of action is case and not trespass, where stones have been thrown upon adjacent lands by blasting and not removed within a reasonable time,[51] and that an action on the case for tort is the proper remedy to recover damages occasioned by a failure of a railroad company to construct farm crossings as required by statute.[52]

For invasion of possession. An action for damages by an abutting owner whose fence has been broken and close entered by the servants of a railroad company, which claims that by virtue of a right of way deed it has title to a portion of the land which abuts on the street, is an action for invasion of possession and not for determination of title,[53] and hence the direction of a verdict for defendant on the theory that it has established title to a portion of the property is error.[54]

For usurping private right of way. A private person, to whom a right of way through a street has been granted, cannot maintain an action for rent against a railroad company which has usurped his right of way;[55] but his remedy is in tort for damages,[56] in which case he may recover damages based on the rental value of the property.[57]

Successive actions. Where the lawful construction of a railroad causes an injury to property of a permanent character, the entire damage, past, present, and future, resulting therefrom should be sued for and recovered in one action,[58] and a judgment in one action has been held to bar any subsequent action for the same cause.[59] On the other hand, if the injury results from a negligent or improper construction, plaintiff may not be required to treat the injury as of a permanent character, but he may be entitled to sue for the damages already sustained and maintain successive actions as often as a new injury occurs,[60] as for each overflow and damage to lands or crops caused by a defective or improperly constructed bridge or culvert,[61] although if plaintiff treats the negligent or defective structure as a permanent source of injury, and recovers the full amount of damages both present and prospective, he cannot afterward maintain a second action for damages.[62]

Where successive injuries have resulted from the same breach of duty, as from a failure of a railroad company to fence its tracks, it has been held that they constitute a single cause of action which may be sued for in one complaint, and that plaintiff may not be compelled to elect as to which he will proceed on,[63] but that, on the contrary, if plaintiff splits up such single cause of action and sues for one item of the damages, the judgment will be a bar to any subsequent action for a different item which might have been included in the first complaint.[64]

Parties. In an action against a railroad company for the rental value of land flooded because of the failure of the company to construct statutory ditches along its right of way, it has been held that one who is at most a cropper and is not in possession or entitled thereto, is not a necessary party plaintiff.[65] One injured by the joint trespass of a railroad company and another may elect to bring an action against the railroad only.[66]

b. Time to Sue and Limitations

The time within which an action may be brought against a railroad company for damage to property occasioned by the construction or maintenance of its road may be controlled by statutory provisions which prescribe a special period of limitations for such actions.

The time within which an action may be brought against a railroad company for damage to property occasioned by the construction or maintenance of its road may be controlled by statutory provisions which prescribe a special period of limitations for such actions.[67] It has been held that such an action may be brought at any time within the period fixed by statute,[68] and that, where the construction of a railroad results in damage to property from trespass, such damage is at once recoverable, so that a cause of action therefor arises immediately.[69]

Under a statute providing that no action shall be maintained against a railroad for damages occasioned by its construction unless commenced within a specified period after the cause of action accrues, the cause of action has been held to accrue, not necessarily at the time when the road is constructed, but when the first injury is sustained.[70] It has further been held that the right of action for damages for constructing an insufficient culvert across a stream does not accrue at the time of construction but at the time when a resulting injury from an overflow occurs,[71] but that each overflow caused by such negligent construction creates a new cause of action.[72] A statute reducing the time for bringing an action against a railroad company for a permanent injury to land caused by the construction or repair of the road has been held not to apply to suits begun before its enactment.[73]

Reason for rule
While the legislature has the power to extend or reduce the time within which an action may be brought, this is subject to the restriction that, when the limitation is shortened, a reasonable time must be given for the commencement of an action before the statute works a bar.—Nichols v. Norfolk & C. R. Co., supra.

another county, it has been held that the action may be brought in either county.

Where land situated in one county is damaged by reason of the construction of a railroad embankment in another county, it has been held that the action may be brought in either county[74] Under some statutory provisions actions for damages to land by reason of the construction of a railroad are not local but transitory, and need not be brought in the county where the land lies,[75] but may be brought in any county through which the road runs,[76] or in any county where service may be had on defendant as provided by statute.[77] The provision of a statute that actions against railroad companies for killing or injuring stock shall be brought before a justice in the township in which the injury occurred or in an adjoining township has been held not to apply to actions for injuries to crops.[78]

Where the suit is for damages and no ground of equity jurisdiction is disclosed by the pleadings, it has been held error to transfer the case to the equity docket.[79]

d. Pleading

(1) In general
(2) Plea or answer
(3) Issues, proof, and variance

(1) In General

In actions for injuries to property resulting from the construction or maintenance of a railroad, the petition or complaint must allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and with sufficient particularity to inform the defendant of the acts or omissions relied on.

In actions for injuries to property resulting from the construction or maintenance of a railroad, as in other civil actions, the petition or complaint must allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action[80] and with sufficient particularity to inform defendant of the acts or omissions relied on.[81] Thus plaintiff must show his right to maintain the action,[82] as well as a breach of duty on the part of the railroad company[83] Plaintiff must also show that the railroad company was guilty of negligence in doing the act alleged[84] or was under a legal obligation to perform the act alleged to have been omitted.[85] Where the complaint is based on a failure to perform an act, the facts out of which the duty to perform such act arose should be pleaded,[86] so that, where the duty imposed is dependent on the existence of certain conditions, the complaint must allege the existence of such conditions,[87] and under a statute allowing a certain time for the performance of the duty the lapse of such time must be alleged.[88]

A direct and express allegation of negligence is not essential where it is a necessary deduction from the facts alleged[89] or where the complaint alleges a failure to perform a statutory duty and damages resulting therefrom.[90] On the other hand, a general allegation of negligence in the construction of a road has been held not sufficient without allegations showing wherein the road was negligently or defectively constructed.[91] Inasmuch as the complaint need not anticipate and negative matters of affirmative defense,[92] in an action for injuries to crops

by stock due to a failure to fence where the road passes through inclosed lands, it is not necessary to negative the possibility that they entered upon plaintiff's lands at the crossing of a public highway.[93]

Notwithstanding plaintiff alleges a contract by which he conveyed a right of way to defendant, if his petition sets up a cause of action based on a breach by defendant of statutory requirements the action may be regarded as on the statute and not on the contract of conveyance of the right of way.[94] Where a complaint states a good cause of action at common law it has been held not demurrable because it contains a prayer for double damages and does not allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action under the statute allowing such damages.[95]

Damages. Plaintiff should allege the amount of damage sustained;[96] but, in an action for injury to plaintiff's lands, if the complaint alleges the amount of the damage sustained it need not state the value of the lands before and after the injury complained of.[97] Although, as a rule, the allegation of damage should not be general but should point out the specific injury sustained,[98] general allegations of the continuous operation of the road and a continuous neglect to fence it and that damages resulted therefrom may be sufficient to authorize a recovery for such damages as invariably follow the exposure of lands by the absence of fences and which cannot easily be itemized.[99]

(2) Plea or Answer

In an action for injuries to property arising from the construction or maintenance of a railroad, the defendant must plead affirmative defenses.

The general rules applicable to the plea or answer in civil actions ordinarily apply to the plea or answer in an action for injuries to property by reason of the construction or maintenance of a railroad.[1] Accordingly, defendant must plead affirmative defenses.[2] It has been held that a plea by defendant that the structure causing the injury was constructed under authority of a city ordinance for the city and not for defendant, and denying that it was negligently constructed, states a defense to the action and should not be stricken.[3] However, a plea by defendant which neither traverses nor confesses and avoids the averments of the complaint has been held bad on demurrer.[4]

(3) Issues, Proof, and Variance

Only such matters may be considered as are put in issue by the pleadings and supported by evidence on the trial, and there can be no recovery on a cause of action not alleged, nor may a failure to state a cause of action be remedied by evidence on the trial.

Only such matters may be considered as are put in issue by the pleadings[5] and supported by evidence on the trial,[6] and there can be no recovery on a cause of action not alleged,[7] nor may a failure to state a cause of action be remedied by evidence on the trial.[8] Plaintiff must, on the trial, support by proof the material allegations of the complaint or a nonsuit may properly be granted,[9] and the case should be proved as alleged, any material variance being fatal to a recovery.[10] In an action for injury to crops by trespassing animals, due to alleged defects in fences or cattle guards, where defendant answers that plaintiff's fence was down in various places and that the animals entered through such fence, it has been held not necessary for defendant to prove that such fence was down in more than one place.[11]

11. Tex.—Kansas City, etc, R. Co. v. Mayfield, Civ.App., 107 S.W 940

The general rules of evidence applicable in civil actions ordinarily apply in actions to recover for injuries to property resulting from the construction or maintenance of a railroad.[12] Accordingly, it may be presumed that all incidental and consequential damages were properly included in an assessment of damages in condemnation proceedings.[13] Likewise, the burden of proving those facts which are essential to a recovery is on plaintiff.[14] Thus the burden is on plaintiff to prove negligence or a breach of duty on the part of the railroad company,[15] and he must also show a causal connection between the injury to his property and the acts of omission or commission on the part of the company of which he complains,[16] as well as that such acts were the efficient and proximate cause of the injuries sustained.[17] On the other hand, the burden of proving affirmative defenses is on the railroad company,[18] and in a jurisdiction in which defendant has the burden of proving contributory negligence the company must prove contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff when relied on as a defense.[19]

(2) Admissibility

In an action to recover for injuries to property resulting from the construction or maintenance of a railroad, evidence, in order to be admissible, must be competent and have some direct and legitimate bearing on the issues.

General rules as to the admissibility of evidence ordinarily apply with respect to the admissibility of evidence in an action to recover for injuries to property resulting from the construction or maintenance of a railroad,[20] and, in order to be admissible, the proffered evidence must be competent[21] and it must have some direct and legitimate bearing on the issues.[22] Thus it has been held that evidence of injuries to property other than that alleged to have been injured is inadmissible.[23] Also, evidence of repairs made subsequent to the injury complained of has been held not admissible on the question of the condition of the property at the time of the injury,[24] although such evidence may be admissible in behalf of defendant in mitigation of damages.[25] So too, evidence as to what plaintiff originally paid for the property,[26] or as to the principle on which damages were assessed in the condemnation proceedings,[27] has been held inadmissible. It has further been held, where the action is based on the negligent manner of constructing the road, that evidence as to the value of plaintiff's land before and after its construction is not admissible, since it does not present a proper measure of damages.[28]

In an action for injury to crops, where a railroad company is not required to construct cattle guards, evidence that the company promised to construct them has been held not admissible, in the absence of evidence that the award of damages in the condemnation proceedings was affected thereby.[29] On the other hand, in an action based on a failure to construct cattle guards as required by statute, evidence that, because of the absence of such equipment, plaintiff was compelled to employ additional help in driving his stock across the right of way has been held admissible as tending to show the damages sustained.[30]

In an action for damages to crops by flooding lands, evidence of the cultivation of crops prior to the time for which a recovery is sought, and the effect of water thereon, has been held admissible

as tending to show the effect of similar conditions during the period for which a recovery is sought if properly limited for such purpose,[31] and evidence of a person who testifies from actual observation as to the insufficiency of a bridge properly to admit the passage of the water of a stream may be admissible, although he is not an expert.[32] However, in an action for flooding lands resulting from the breaking of a railroad embankment alleged to have been negligently constructed, where defendant alleges that it was properly constructed and that the injury was caused by an unprecedented flood, evidence that certain city and county bridges were washed away has been held not admissible on the part of defendant in the absence of evidence that they were properly constructed.[33]

(3) Weight and Sufficiency

In actions for injuries to property resulting from the construction or maintenance of a railroad, the general rules applicable to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in civil actions ordinarily apply.

In actions for injuries to property resulting from the construction or maintenance of a railroad, the general rules applicable to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in civil actions ordinarily apply,[34] and, under such rules, particular evidence has been held sufficient[35] or insufficient[36] to establish various issues, sufficient to support or warrant certain findings,[37] or sufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff[38] or for defendant.[39] In an action for injuries due to defects in a highway bridge across a railroad which it was defendant's duty to keep in repair, a failure to prove that defendant constructed the bridge has been held not fatal to a recovery.[40] However, where the action is for a nuisance in constructing a railroad in a street and the road was constructed by lawful authority, there can be no recovery in the absence of evidence that the road was constructed in a negligent or improper manner.[41]

f. Trial

In an action for injury to property resulting from the construction or maintenance of a railroad, disputed questions of fact should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court.

In actions for injuries to property resulting from the construction or maintenance of a railroad, the conduct of the trial is controlled by the principles relating to the conduct of the trial of civil actions generally.[42] Accordingly, disputed questions of fact should be submitted to the jury,[43] who are the

Questions held for jury
(1) Whether railroad company was negligent in failing to maintain proper bridge in anticipation of flood—Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. Wagner, C.C.A.Mont., 86 F.2d 63.

(2) Whether railroad company was negligent in failing to provide sufficient opening through embankment to afford proper drainage to adjoining sole judges of the weight of the evidence[44] and of the credibility of witnesses.[45] The court should instruct the jury correctly as to the law of the case,[46] and should not submit issues or grounds of liability not raised by the pleadings[47] or not supported by the evidence.[48] Where both a failure to erect and a failure to maintain a fence are charged, a judgment may be sustained by proof of either allegation.[49]

Verdict and findings. The general rules applicable to the verdict and findings in civil actions apply,[50] and the findings should not be conflicting or inconsistent with each other.[51] Where the evidence on an issue is not contradicted or is legally insufficient to raise a question of fact, the court may properly give a mandatory instruction thereon,[52] but the court should not direct a verdict where the evidence is legally sufficient to raise a question of fact as to defendant's liability.[53]

ure of damages is that of just compensation for the actionable injury sustained,[54] and the damages should be limited to those resulting from the particular acts or injuries alleged in the complaint[55] and shown by the evidence,[56] and plaintiff cannot recover a larger amount than he alleges he has sustained.[57]

If the injury is of a permanent character the measure of damages usually is the diminution in the value of the property[58] or the difference between the value of the property before and after the injury.[59] However, if the injury is caused by a structure or condition of a temporary character or which can and should be remedied, and for the continuance of which successive actions for resulting injuries may be maintained, plaintiff may not be entitled to recover as for a permanent injury to his property,[60] but only for the injury sustained prior to the action;[61] and, in such a case, the measure of damages to the property is the depreciation in the rental value during the continuance of such condition,[62] and not the difference in the market value of the property.[63]

Where the injury results merely from the negligent or improper manner of constructing the railroad, it has been held that the measure of damages is not the difference in the value of the property before and after the construction of the railroad,[64] but that the proper measure of damages is the difference in the value of the property with the road constructed as it is and what its value would be with the road properly constructed,[65] or the difference between the rental value of the property with the road constructed as it is and the rental value of the property if the road were properly constructed.[66] Where, in the construction of the road, the contractors of the railroad company commit wanton or willful trespasses on the land of another the company may be held liable for exemplary damages.[67]

Obstruction of access. Where, by reason of the construction or maintenance of a railroad, a street or highway is blocked so as to obstruct access to plaintiff's place of business, the measure of damages ordinarily is the loss of profits in the business,[68] based on the price which his products would have brought in the available market[69] during the period of the temporary interruption of his business,[70] in addition to the value of the good will lost by him as a result of such obstruction,[71] and not the depreciation in the rental value of the property.[72] However, since such damages are considered special damages, it has been held that defendant must have received notice thereof in order that plaintiff may be entitled thereto.[73]

Obstruction of crossing. For the obstruction of a private crossing the measure of damages ordinarily is such amount as will fairly compensate plaintiff for the deprivation of its use during the period of obstruction,[74] and punitive damages may not be

What constitutes notice

Railroad, having placed person in position of supervising construction work and clothing him with at least apparent authority, could not claim that notice to him of special damages which would result to dairyman from blocking highway was not notice to railroad.—Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Mercer, Civ.App., 58 S.W.2d 896, reversed on other grounds, Com. App., 90 S.W.2d 557, 127 Tex. 220, 106 A.L.R. 1299, motion overruled 93 S.W.2d 376, 127 Tex. 220.

recovered if the railroad company did not act wantonly or maliciously but under a mistake as to its legal rights.[75]

Failure to construct fences or cattle guards Where a railroad company fails to construct fences or cattle guards, the measure of the landowner's damages is the amount of the loss or injury directly resulting,[76] and the measure of damages for the general injury to his property is the diminution in its rental value, caused by the absence of the fences or cattle guards,[77] and not merely what it would cost to construct them.[78]

Failure to construct private or farm crossings. For failure to construct private or farm crossings as required by statute, the measure of damages is the actual loss and inconvenience suffered by plaintiff in the use of his premises by reason of their absence.[79] However, where a railroad company is required by statute to leave openings in its right-of-way fences, where the road passes through an inclosure, and the company, although constructing them for others, refuses to do so for plaintiff, after a demand therefor, exemplary damages may be awarded.[80]

Flooding land. Ordinarily, where lands are flooded by reason of the negligent or improper construction of a railroad, the measure of damages is the value of property destroyed together with the injury to the land,[81] provided there is an injury to the land itself,[82] and the damage for such injury is measured by the difference in the value of the land before and after the flooding,[83] taking into consideration its condition with respect to crops.[84]

On the other hand, where there is no permanent injury to realty, it has been held that the rule permitting a recovery of the difference between the reasonable market value of the land before the injury and such value after the injury does not apply.[85] So it has been held that if there is no physical injury to the land itself but it is merely rendered subject to overflow, the measure of damages is the injury resulting from each overflow,[86] and that if the cause is one which may be remedied, the damage to the land is not the difference in its value but the depreciation in the rental value during the continuance of such condition,[87] or the fair cash rental value of the land during the time for which the owners are deprived of its use,[88] or the reasonable rental value of the land withheld from crop production because of the deprivation of the use of the land.[89]

Destruction of crops. The measure of damages for the destruction of crops is not the value of the crop at the date of maturity,[90] or the rental value of the land,[91] or the difference in the value of the land before and after the destruction,[92] but the proper measure of damages has been held to be the value of the crop at the time of maturity less the cost of cultivation and marketing,[93] or the value of the crop at the time of the injury,[94] although such value should not be estimated according to the intrinsic value of an immature crop,[95] but according to the probable yield and value at maturity and the cost of cultivation and marketing.[96] In case of damage to crops, the proper measure of damages has been held to be the difference between the market value of the crops which would have been raised and the market value of the crop actually raised, less what would have been the reasonable cost of gathering and marketing that part of the crop which was destroyed.[97]

While plaintiff may be entitled to recover for the permanent injury to his land and the past damages to his crops in one action,[98] he is not entitled to recover the value of land rendered unfit for cultivation and also damages to crops not planted.[99] A tenant in common owning only an undivided part of the land, but owning the entire crop being cultivated thereon, has been held entitled to recover the entire amount of the damages to such crop.[1]

h. Review

An appellate court ordinarily will not disturb the verdict or findings of the jury when based on conflicting evidence and there is evidence legally sufficient to support them.

In accordance with the rules applicable to review in civil actions generally, as discussed in Appeal and Error §§ 1453–1834, an appellate court ordinarily will not disturb the verdict or findings of the jury when based on conflicting evidence and there is evidence legally sufficient to support them,[2] and a verdict will not be set aside on the ground that the damages are excessive where the amount was variously estimated by different witnesses and the verdict is fairly within the estimates given,[3] or is not so great as clearly to indicate that the jury acted corruptly or disregarded the instructions of the court.[4] Also, judgment will not be reversed for an error which was not prejudicial to appellant in the admission of evidence[5] or in the instructions to the jury,[6] or for a refusal to give a special charge requested which, although correct, is covered by the general charge given.[7]

B. INJURIES FROM OPERATION

§ 477. Existence and Extent of Liability

Ordinarily an adjoining landowner may not, where a railroad is constructed by lawful authority, recover for injury or inconvenience caused by the smoke, noise, vibration, or other incidents necessary to its operation where it is not operated in a negligent or unlawful manner; but a railroad company may be held liable for any injury to property caused by the negligent or improper operation of its trains.

Except as an abutting or adjacent property owner is, under constitutional restrictions against the "taking" or "damaging" or "injuring" of property for public use without compensation, entitled to compensation for consequential damages generally, as discussed in Eminent Domain §§ 110–135, and more particularly to damages from smoke, ashes, foul odors, noise, vibration, etc., incident to the operation of a railroad, as considered in Eminent Domain § 171, ordinarily an adjoining landowner may not, where a railroad is constructed by lawful authority, recover for injury or inconvenience caused by the smoke, noise, vibration, or other incidents necessary to its operation where it is not operated in a negligent or unlawful manner,[8] although it may be located in the streets of a town or city,[9] since the act of operation, being authorized by law, cannot confer any right of action as long as it is exercised in a lawful and proper manner;[10] and the same rule applies under similar circumstances to the injury or inconvenience due to the location, maintenance, and use of structures and appliances necessarily incident to the operation of the road, such as terminal yards, turntables, engine houses, and the like.[11] Moreover, with respect to personal property of third persons upon the private right of way of a railroad, the railroad company may not be held liable for injury caused by the operation of its trains without negligence,[12] and the operators of a train are not required to exercise a greater duty to discover the presence of a vehicle on the track at a point other than a crossing than is accorded a trespasser or licensee.[13]

On the other hand, in the absence of contributory negligence on the part of the one claiming damages,[14] and, under some statutory provisions, even where claimant was contributorily negligent,[15] a railroad company may be held liable for any injury to property caused by the negligent or improper operation of its trains,[16] or resulting from the negligent or improper manner of locating, using, or maintaining structures and appurtenances incident to the operation of the road,[17] although they are necessary to its operation,[18] provided the negligence of the company is the proximate cause of the injury,[19] inasmuch as the right of a railroad company to run its engines and trains over its tracks is coupled with the duty so to operate them as not to injure the property of others near the track.[20] So, where a railroad is operated along a street which is also used by the public, the company may be held liable for an injury to personal property lawfully on such street resulting from a failure on its part to exercise ordinary care.[21] Where plaintiff undertakes to show what has been done by other railroad companies as a test or standard of duty for defendant railroad company, it must appear that what is proposed is not only scientifically practicable, but also economically and financially so.[22]

Private rights. A railroad company may not exercise its private rights to the prejudice of others without compensation for the injury occasioned,[23] and where the right exercised is a mere adjunct or incident to the power conferred, but is not necessary to the performance of the duty imposed, it is a private right.[24] Thus, the erection and maintenance of a coal chute is not for the public benefit but for the private convenience of the railroad and is done in the private capacity of the company.[25]

b. Blocking or delaying work of extinguishing fire

a. In General

Where a railroad is located by lawful authority upon or across a street or highway, the right to operate the road confers no authority to use the street in an unauthorized or improper manner, and private persons may be entitled to recover for any special property damages sustained by reason of such improper use.

Although where a railroad company is authorized to construct and operate a railroad in a street a court may not have authority to restrict the number of trains which may be operated thereon as a condition precedent to the construction of the track,[26] where a railroad is located by lawful authority upon or across a street or highway the right to operate the road confers no authority to use the street in an unauthorized or improper manner,[27] such as converting it into a freight yard, switch yard, or place for storing cars or making up trains,[28] or allowing cars loaded with offensive substances to remain in the streets for an unnecessary and unreasonable length of time,[29] and private persons may be entitled to recover for any special property damages sustained by reason of such improper use.[30] While a private individual may not be entitled to recover where a railroad company wrongfully allows its cars to stand so as to obstruct a public crossing and he has sustained no damage other than the mere delay occasioned to the public generally,[31] a private person may be entitled to recover any special damages sustained by him by reason of the obstruction.[32] Moreover, a railroad company may be held liable for rendering impassable a crossing necessary to a landowner's access to a public road, which access was cut off by the railroad,[33] even though the destruction of the crossing resulted from necessary additions to, or changes in, the track.[34]

Although it has been held that a railroad company is not liable for obstructing a private crossing with its trains unless such obstruction was negligent or unnecessary,[35] it has also been held that the right of a railroad company extends only to the reasonable necessity of the prudent operation of the road, and if it goes beyond this and willfully or negligently obstructs a private crossing, the court may grant the landowner adequate relief.[36] Moreover, one whose private crossing is blocked may not be guilty of contributory negligence in failing to prepare a crossing by which to go around the obstruction, where he was justified in expecting that the obstruction would be removed on notice within a reasonable time or at any time.[37] On the violation of a statute making it a misdemeanor to permit a train to remain standing upon a crossing, a railroad company may be held liable for the injury and damage flowing directly from a breach of such duty as a natural and probable result.[38]

b. Blocking or Delaying Work of Extinguishing Fire

A railroad company may be held liable for injuries to property caused by the negligent interference by its servants with the fire department, if its servants have knowledge of the fire and of the efforts being made to control it, or in the exercise of due care should have had such knowledge.

With respect to the liability of a railroad company for injuries to property caused by the operation of its road, it has been held that such a company has a duty to operate its trains with reasonable regard for the rights of public firemen and private citizens to use the public crossings and streets in order to reach a fire and extinguish it,[39] and also that the exclusive control of a railroad of its right of way is subject to the exigencies of public safety caused by fire and conflagration,[40] so that a railroad company may be held liable for the consequences of the negligent interference by its servants with the fire department, if its servants have knowledge of the fire and of the efforts being made to control it, or in the exercise of due care should have had such knowledge.[41] Thus, where the servants of a railroad company have sufficient knowledge of the facts, the company is under a duty to do that which is reasonably necessary to avoid or mitigate its interference with the extinguishment of a fire and may be held liable for such injuries to property as result from its failure to do so,[42] even though the failure to act on its part does not amount to a refusal to act.[43]

On the other hand, knowledge or notice on the part of the company ordinarily is regarded as essential to liability,[44] since, if any liability is to be imposed on the railroad company, such liability must arise from something done or left undone after those operating the train have knowledge of the existence of the fire,[45] and the persons in charge of the train must have knowledge of the fire and of the fact that by running the train past the crossing or by stopping the train at the crossing the work of extinguishing the fire will be hampered.[46] Although it has been held that the unexplained blocking of a street crossing, resulting in injury from failure of a fire department to reach a fire, in itself establishes negligence,[47] ordinarily a railroad company may not be rendered liable for resulting damages by the mere fact that its blocking of a railroad crossing occasions a delay to fire apparatus.[48]

Violation of state or municipal regulation. Where the violation by a railroad company of a statutory regulation[49] or of a municipal ordinance[50] occasions injury to property through the prevention of the fire department from promptly reaching a fire, the company may be held liable for such injury, although it has been held that a stop at a place prohibited by ordinance, occasioned by the necessity of repairing a broken brake appliance, would not impose liability[51] where the trainmen did not know of the fire[52] and the repair was necessary to avoid the danger of derailment.[53]

Proximate cause. In order that a railroad company may be held liable for injuries to property because it wrongfully blocked or delayed the work of extinguishing a fire, the violation of the statute,[54] or other act of the railroad company complained of,[55] must have been the proximate cause of the injuries sustained.

Contributory negligence. If negligence on the part of the person injured contributes to the injury, he is not entitled to recovery therefor.[56] So, where plaintiff is negligent in failing to have his fire-extinguishing equipment in proper condition for use, it may be sufficient to prevent his recovery.[57]

§ 479. —— Interference with, or Cutting of, Fire Hose

Where a railroad company has actual or imputed notice or warning of the probable presence of a hose across its track, which hose is being employed in the extinguishment of a fire, it must exercise ordinary care in stopping its trains in order to avoid cutting the hose, and it may be held liable for a property loss occurring as a direct result of its interference with the hose.

Where a railroad company has actual or imputed notice or warning of the probable presence of a hose across its track, which hose is being employed in the extinguishment of a fire, it must exercise ordinary care in stopping its trains in order to avoid cutting the hose.[58] Thus it may not run a train

Knowledge may be imputed from across such a hose if the hose has been, or should have been, observed by the operators of the train,[59] and a railroad company may be held liable for a property loss occurring as a direct result of its interference with the hose either carelessly[60] or willfully.[61] This is true inasmuch as firemen and other persons lawfully engaged in seeking to control or extinguish a fire on property adjoining a railroad right of way have the right to enter upon the right of way and lay a fire hose across the railroad tracks in order to do so,[62] and they are not required to exhaust the possibility of obtaining water on the side of the railroad track nearer the fire before laying a hose across the track.[63]

On the other hand, it has been held that a railroad company may not be charged with negligence in not looking for and discovering a hose laid across its tracks to carry water to extinguish a fire,[64] and a railroad company, in the regular operation of its road, may not be held liable for a property loss resulting from its use of its right of way and tracks across which a fire hose has been laid unless those in charge know or should know of the existence of the fire and that the fire hose is across the tracks.[65]

§ 480. —— Derailment or Loss of Control of Cars

Where a railroad company is guilty of negligence in allowing a locomotive or cars to escape from its control, or to be derailed, it may be held liable for injuries proximately caused thereby to property on adjacent premises, at least where the owner has not been guilty of contributory negligence.

Where a railroad company is guilty of negligence in allowing a locomotive[66] or cars[67] to escape from its control or to be derailed,[68] or where it negligently allows its cars to run off a spur track,[69] it may be held liable for injuries proximately caused thereby to property on adjacent premises, at least where the owner has not been guilty of contributory negligence,[70] even though the property is not legally situated when injured, provided the wrongful act of the owner is not the proximate cause of the injury.[71]

Notwithstanding an agreement between the railroad and the owner of the property exempting the railroad from negligence, as discussed infra § 481, a railroad company may be held liable for an injury which is the result of willful and wanton negligence,[72] or of gross negligence,[73] or of wanton disregard of plaintiff's rights.[74]

§ 481. —— Release from Liability

Where a switch track is constructed for the convenience of the owner of private property, a valid agreement under which the owner of such property releases the railroad company from all liability for damage for injury occasioned to his property by the railroad, while operating locomotives and cars upon such track, will be sustained.

A statute limiting liability of a landowner to a licensee to a willful and wanton injury had reference only to liability of an owner or occupier to one injured because of failure to keep premises in proper repair, and did not apply to an action for damage to an automobile arising out of railroad's negligence in kicking a car into a siding with such force that car jumped bumper block, crashed through loading platform, crossed street, and ran into side of plaintiff's parked automobile.—Southern Ry. damage for injury occasioned to his property by the railroad, while operating locomotives and cars upon such track, will be sustained;[75] and such an agreement, where not ambiguous, will not be construed more strongly against the railroad company where the railroad company is the party making the contract.[76]

§ 482. Actions

a. In general
b. Pleading
c. Evidence
d. Trial

a. In General

The form of action for injury to property by reason of the operation of a railroad in a public street has been held to be an action on the case, notwithstanding the fee to the center of the street may be in the adjoining owners.

The form of action for injury to property by reason of the operation of a railroad in a public street has been held not to be an action of trespass but an action on the case, notwithstanding the fee to the center of the street may be in the adjoining owners.[77]

Time to sue and limitations. While it has been held that any cause of action for damages to adjoining property incident to the mere operation of a railroad arises as soon as the road is put in operation and that the statute of limitations begins to run from that date,[78] it has also been held that, as to injuries resulting from an improper or negligent operation, the cause of action does not accrue until the wrongful act is done and the limitation runs only from that time.[79]

b. Pleading

In an action for injury to property caused by the operation of a railroad, the plaintiff must allege with reasonable definiteness and certainty every fact necessary to constitute a cause of action.

The general rules applicable to the pleadings in civil actions ordinarily apply to the pleadings in an action for injury to property caused by the operation of a railroad.[80] Thus plaintiff must allege with reasonable definiteness and certainty every fact necessary to constitute a cause of action,[81] as, for example, in actions for damages for blocking a crossing so as to delay a fire department,[82] or for interfering with a fire hose laid across the track,[83] or for injury from a car leaving the tracks,[84] or by reason of injury from noise, vibration, smoke, and similar matters.[85]

In an action for a nuisance, if the acts alleged as constituting the nuisance are acts which the company has a right under its charter to do, if done in a legal and proper manner, the complaint must show that such acts were done in a negligent, unlawful, or improper manner;[86] and a complaint which alleges negligence in a general way without setting forth with a reasonable degree of particularity the things done or omitted, so as to show a breach of duty, has been held defective and subject to demurrer.[87] In an action for injury to property where the circumstances under which it occurred impose no duty on plaintiff other than to remain passive, an express allegation that it occurred without any contributory negligence on his part has been held unnecessary.[88]

c. Evidence

In an action for injury to property resulting from the operation of a railroad, the plaintiff must establish his case by a preponderance of the evidence.

The general rules applicable to the evidence in civil actions apply to the evidence in an action for injury to property resulting from the operation of a railroad,[89] and plaintiff has the burden of proving those facts which are essential to recovery.[90] Although under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur there is a presumption that an injury to property was due to the negligence of a railroad company if it was caused by an instrumentality solely under the control of the company,[91] such presumption may be satisfactorily met by a showing that defendant company exercised all reasonable care and caution to prevent the damage.[92] Moreover, in a suit for damages caused by smoke, soot, and oil, the rule of res ipsa loquitur has been held not applicable where the evidence shows that the emitting of smoke, soot, and oil happened in the usual course of things, even though proper care was used.[93]

Under some statutory provisions, where property is damaged by the running of the locomotives, cars, or other machinery of a railroad company, there is a presumption of negligence on the part of the company[94] unless the company shows that its agents exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence,[95] but such a statutory inference of negligence has been held to be at an end where the railroad company has introduced some material evidence tending to show reasonable care on its part.[96]

In an action against a railroad company for blocking a fire department crossing, the burden is on plaintiff to establish the extent of his injury attributable to the negligence of the company;[97] and in jurisdictions which require plaintiff to prove his freedom from contributory negligence plaintiff must prove freedom from contributory negligence.[98] However, it has also been held that where the crossing has been obstructed by the railroad for an unreasonable length of time, the burden is shifted to the railroad company to satisfy the jury that the obstruction could not have been avoided by the exercise of proper care and diligence,[99] inasmuch as a failure or refusal on the part of the employees of a railroad company to take any action to remove the obstruction within an extended period of time, in the absence of an explanation, has been held to raise a presumption of negligence.[1]

Admissibility. In order to be admissible, the proffered evidence must be competent, material, and relevant to the issues.[2] Thus evidence of similar injuries to the property of other persons[3] or of personal injuries due to the negligent operation of the trains of the railroad company[4] has been held not admissible in such an action. Also, evidence that plaintiff's buildings projected upon the sidewalk of the street so that they were themselves a nuisance has been held irrelevant.[5] In an action based on the negligent construction of an engine house, it has been held that evidence that the defect complained of was remedied after suit was instituted is not competent as an admission of negligence, but that it is competent as tending to show that such defect was the cause of the injury complained of.[6]

Weight and sufficiency. The general rules relative to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in civil actions apply.[7] Thus plaintiff must properly establish the essential elements of his case in an action against a railroad company for injuries to his property arising from the blocking of a fire

The general rules applicable to the trial of civil actions apply to the trial of an action for injury to property resulting from the operation of a railroad.

The general rules applicable to the trial of civil actions apply to the trial of an action for injury to property resulting from the operation of a railroad.[15] Accordingly, in such an action, questions of law should be determined by the court,[16] and questions of facts should be submitted to the jury.[17]

This rule has been applied in actions for damages for blocking a crossing so as to delay a fire department,[18] or for running over, or interfering with, a fire hose laid across the track,[19] or from derailment or loss of control of cars,[20] or from failure to stop a flow of oil from a wrecked train

Instructions. The general rules applicable to the instructions in civil actions apply to the instructions in actions for injury to property resulting from the operation of a railroad.[23] So the instructions should conform and be confined to the issues made by the pleadings and evidence, and on which the case has been tried.[24]

Verdict and findings. The rules applicable to the verdict and findings in civil actions generally apply to the verdict and findings in an action for injury to property resulting from the operation of a railroad.[25]

§ 483. —— Damages

A person is entitled to just compensation for any property loss he may sustain from the unlawful or negligent operation of a railroad.

A person is entitled to just compensation for any property loss he may sustain from the unlawful or negligent operation of a railroad.[26] While damages which are remote, problematical, and speculative may not be recovered,[27] the mere fact that their extent cannot be accurately measured will not relieve the railroad company from liability.[28] Where the wrongful acts complained of are of a temporary nature, the railroad company may not be held liable in damages for the cost of a permanent change in the premises to accommodate them to the conditions temporarily created.[29] In case of temporary injury, the measure of damages is the diminished rental value of the premises,[30] and where, as a direct result of the wrongful acts of a railroad company in the emission of smoke, the walls of plaintiff's premises are blackened the damage occasioned thereby may be considered apart from the diminution of the rental value of the premises.[31]

a. Duties and Liabilities in General

Railroad companies are liable in damages for injury caused by fire resulting from the negligent operation of their roads.

In the absence of statutory regulation of the subject, railroad companies are liable in damages for destruction or injury caused by fire resulting from the negligent operation of their roads.[32] However, railroad companies are not insurers against loss by fire;[33] negligence is an essential element of liability[34] and is the gist of the action,[35] and without negligence the injury is damnum absque injuria.[36] Where the injury is not due to the negligence of the company, the loss must be borne by the owners as one of the incidents of the operation of railroads.[37]

A railroad is not liable for injury from fire caused by licensees on its property unless their acts constitute a nuisance which the railroad knowingly suffers to remain.[38]

b. Degree of Care Required

The degree of care to be exercised by a railroad company to avoid injury to persons or property by fires is ordinary or reasonable care, which is dependent on the circumstances of the particular case

The degree of care to be exercised by a railroad company to avoid injury to persons or property by fires is ordinary or reasonable care,[39] that is to say, such care and caution as an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances.[40] However, "ordinary care" being a relative term,[41] the degree of care to be exercised depends on the circumstances of the particular case,[42] and must be commensurate with, or in proportion to, the danger to be apprehended of inflicting injury on the person or property of another.[43] What is care in one case may be negligence in another, where the danger is greater and more care is required.[44] In proportion as the hazards increase, there should be a corresponding increase in the care exercised.[45] It has also been held that the necessities of the railway service and the duty of the company to its patrons and the public must be taken into consideration in determining what is reasonable care.[46]

Keeping in view these principles in order to determine whether reasonable care has been exercised, due regard must be had to the dryness of the season,[47] the strength and direction of the wind,[48] the nature[49] and proximity of the property liable to be damaged,[50] and the character of the vegetation of the territory through which the road runs, and its combustible nature.[51]

§ 485. Under Statutes

In many jurisdictions the doctrine that negligence is an indispensable element of liability of a railroad for injuries by fires has been abrogated either wholly or in part by statute

The rule of liability for injuries by fires set out by railroad companies prevailing in the absence of statutory regulation discussed supra § 484, has been recognized by statute in some jurisdictions.[52] However, in other jurisdictions, the doctrine that negligence is an indispensable element of liability has been abrogated either wholly or in part by statute,[53] and absolute liability is imposed on railroad companies for injuries to property from fires result-

51 C.J. p. 1147 note 59.
The legislature may make railroads absolutely liable for damages

ing from the operation of their roads, however they may be caused,[54] or absolute liability is imposed for injuries from fires communicated by locomotives,[55] or for injuries from fires originating on the railroad's lands caused by operating their roads,[56] or for injuries by fire communicated by locomotives or originating within the limits of the right of way in consequence of the act of its authorized agents or employees.[57]

A statute making a company liable for injuries to property by fire communicated by a locomotive unless due diligence is used and suitable expedients employed to prevent such injury does not make a railroad company liable if it is not in fault.[58] It has been held that a statute providing for absolute liability irrespective of negligence of a person setting a fire in woods, marshes, or prairies contemplates a direct "setting on fire" not the result of accident that cannot be avoided, and does not render liable a railroad company from whose engine fire escaped in the absence of any defect in the construction of the engine or lack of care or skill in operating it.[59]

§ 486. —— Validity of Statutes

Statutes which eliminate negligence as an indispensable element of liability of a railroad for injuries from fires have been upheld as a valid exercise of the police power.

Statutes eliminating negligence as an indispensable element of liability have been frequently assailed as in violation of the organic law of the state and federal government, but their validity has been uniformly upheld.[60]

Thus, it has been held that these statutes do not impair the obligation of contracts,[61] or abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States,[62] or violate a state constitutional provision which prohibits discrimination and unequal restraints and disqualifications.[63] These statutes have been sustained on the ground that their enactment is a valid exercise of the police power,[64] although this has been denied in a decision in which such a statute was nevertheless upheld on other grounds.[65] Also, these statutes have been held not to contravene a state constitutional provision declaring private property only subservient to the public welfare and aside from that inviolate.[66]

§ 487. —— Nature, Construction, and Operation of Statutes in General

Statutes which eliminate negligence as an essential element of liability of a railroad for injuries from fires are generally held to be remedial and are liberally construed.

Although there is some authority to the effect that statutes which eliminate negligence as an essential element of liability are to be strictly construed because of the fact that they create a special and exceptional liability,[67] the weight of authority is that such statutes are not penal but remedial in their nature,[68] and, as such, are to be construed liberally,[69] so as to secure to the parties injured an indemnity from those who reap the advantages and profits arising from the dangerous mode of locomotion, by means of which buildings and other property are destroyed.[70]

The liability imposed by these statutes has been described as a liability without fault,[71] and their effect is to make railroad companies insurers against damages caused by fire originating in the manner therein designated,[72] which liability is not affected by the fact that the owner of the property burned has collected insurance on it.[73]

In some jurisdictions these statutes are held not to supersede the right to bring an action at common law against railroad companies for injuries to property by fires caused by their negligence,[74] the statutes, it is said, merely supplementing the common-law liability by making the liability not dependent on the negligence of the companies;[75] but there are decisions in other jurisdictions at variance with this rule.[76]

A statute imposing absolute liability on railroad companies for property injured by fires communicated by a railroad is limited to liability for property destroyed, and does not authorize a recovery for personal injuries or death resulting from a fire started by a locomotive without proof of negligence.[77]

Property owners, within a statute providing that a railroad company shall be liable to pay property owners for all damages by fire from its engines, include not only those whose lands are traversed by the roadbed, but also those whose lands are sufficiently near thereto to be damaged by such fire.[78]

Railroads within statutes. The statutes apply to railroad companies which obtain their charters before, as well as after, their passage,[79] and when the right of way of the company was acquired by deed, as well as when acquired by eminent domain.[80] They also apply to companies which have leased their roads to other companies with stipulations that the whole transportation of passengers and freight on the railroads leased shall be done by the lessees.[81] Where the statute imposes absolute liability on all railroad corporations and provides that the term "railroad corporations" shall be deemed to mean all railroad corporations, companies, and individuals, owning or operating railroads, railroads operated by partnerships are within its terms.[82] According to some decisions, the term "railroad corporations" as used in the statute means only such companies as are common carriers,[83] while other decisions hold that the statute applies with equal force to all railroads operated by steam power whether or not common carriers,[84] and, hence, applies to logging railroads.[85]

§ 488. —— To What Property Applicable

Statutes imposing liability on railroad companies for damage caused by fire without regard to negligence apply to damage to both real and personal property.

Statutes imposing liability on railroad companies for injury or loss caused by fire even in the absence of negligence have very generally been held to apply to injury or loss to both real and personal property.[86] With respect to personal property, it has been held that the statutes are applicable although the company has no knowledge, or reason, or cause to believe that such property was situated where it might be so injured.[87] They have also been held to apply to wood, coal, and other personal property situated on adjoining lands and there used by a dealer as his stock in trade,[88] and to trees,[89] shrubs, and flowers,[90] and to fences by the side of the track.[91]

It is very generally held that the fact that personal property destroyed is of a movable character will not affect the liability of the railroad under statutes imposing liability without negligence.[92] A limitation has been placed on this rule to the effect that, in order to bring a case for destruction of personal property within the statute, some permanency of location is requisite;[93] but this limitation has been repudiated and severely criticised.[94]

The statutes, of course, apply to buildings along the route of the road so near thereto as to be exposed to danger of fire from the locomotives,[95] and in general are held to extend to the contents of such structures.[96] Where a statute provides that a company shall be liable for injury to property "along its route" by fire communicated by its locomotives, it is liable for injuries to property along its route whether the property is outside of the lines of its roadway or lawfully within those lines.[97] In construing such phrases as "along the route" or "along the line of the railroad," in determining the limits of distance on the liability of the railroad company with respect to the property destroyed, it has generally been held that no arbitrary rule as to distance can be formulated,[98] and that the definition of these phrases must be determined by whether the property destroyed was so near to the route of the railroad as to be exposed to the danger of fire from locomotives.[99] Applying this principle, it has been held that it is not necessary that the property injured or destroyed should abut on or adjoin the right of way.[1]

The statutes have no application to property delivered to a railroad company as a common carrier and in its custody as warehouseman at the time the fire destroyed it.[2]

§ 489. —— Insurable Interest Conferred on Companies

Statutes imposing liability on railroad companies for damages caused by fire even in the absence of negligence may be limited to property permanently located on or near the railroad so as to be insurable.

Statutes imposing liability on railroad companies for damages caused by fire in the absence of negligence often confer on railroad companies an insurable interest coextensive with the property for which they may be responsible,[3] and under such a provision, in some states, it is held that the company's liability extends to all kinds of property and is not limited to such property as is usually regarded as insurable[4] or dependent on the question whether an insurer can be found to take the risk.[5] In other states, however, it is held that the company's liability under such a provision is limited to property

§ 490. Construction and Equipment of Locomotives

a. In general
b. Adoption of new or untried appliances

a. In General

A railroad company is not required to provide locomotives so constructed and equipped as absolutely to prevent the communication of fire to property along its line, although it must use ordinary and reasonable care in constructing and equipping its locomotives.

Since a railroad company is neither an insurer against injury from fire to property from the operation of its road as considered supra § 484, nor of the safety or perfection of the devices and appliances adopted by it to prevent fire,[7] a company is not required to provide locomotives so constructed and equipped as absolutely to prevent the communication of fire to property along its line.[8] However, railroad companies are not permitted to establish their own standard of duty in the matter of the equipment of their locomotives.[9] While they are only required to exercise reasonable or ordinary care,[10] which is such care as a man of ordinary prudence would exercise under like circumstances,[11] it is their duty to use ordinary or reasonable care to provide locomotives so constructed and equipped as to avoid the unnecessary communication of fire to premises adjoining their roads, otherwise they will be guilty of negligence and liable for the resulting damages[12] A failure of judgment honestly exercised in an attempt to discharge this duty will not render the company liable;[13] nor can it be held to unreasonable and ruinous efforts to prevent injury[14] In determining whether ordinary or reasonable care has been exercised in providing appliances for the prevention of fire, regard must be had to the time and place, since certain appliances, whose use at certain times and places would be negligence, might be properly used in other seasons and localities.[15]

The law does not require that a company shall adopt any particular kind of appliance.[16] It will be sufficient if the appliance adopted is of approved construction and in common use,[17] or is reasonably suitable and reasonably calculated to prevent the emission of sparks,[18] or emits sparks too small to be dangerous.[19] However, it has been required by statute that locomotives be equipped with the most effectual spark arresters in practical use,[20] and it has variously been stated that companies must use ordinary or reasonable care and diligence to provide their locomotives with the best and most approved appliances for preventing the escape of fire known to them and in general practical use,[21] with such approved appliances as are in general use,[22] with the best well-known practical appliances,[23] with appliances so constructed as to give the best practicable protection against the escape of fire and sparks,[24] with appliances which are reasonably fit and safe for the purposes intended,[25] with such appliances and contrivances as are in practical use by well regulated companies and which have been proved by experience to be adapted to the purpose,[26] with appliances in common use of approved pattern and in reasonably good repair,[27] with the most effective modern practical appliances for preventing the escape of sparks of fire,[28] with appliances for the prevention of the escape of fire according to the latest and most approved state of the art,[29] or with the best appliances in general use, the use of which is consistent with the practical operation of their locomotives.[30]

Effect of adoption of appliances required by law. If a railroad company has adopted and put into use on its locomotives appliances for the prevention of fire such as are required by law, it will not be liable for injury caused by fire communicated by its locomotives,[31] unless it is guilty of negligence in some other respect,[32] such for instance, as the negligent management of the locomotive and train,[33] or negligence in allowing combustible matter to accumulate on the right of way,[34] or a negligent failure to prevent the spread of a fire kindled by one of its locomotives properly equipped and managed.[35] It has been held that noncompliance with a statute making it a misdemeanor for companies to fail to equip their locomotives with suitable spark arrester, with consequent damage, amounts to negligence per se.[36]

b. Adoption of New or Untried Appliances

Railroad companies do not have the unqualified duty to adopt new appliances before their efficiency has been demonstrated by actual use.

While it has been said that railroad companies are bound to avail themselves of all the discoveries which science has put within reach for that purpose, in constructing their locomotives, provided they are such as under the circumstances it is reasonable to require them to adopt,[37] this does not impose on them the unqualified duty of adopting new appliances.[38] Before a company can be held liable for failure to adopt appliances other than those in use by it, their efficacy must have been demonstrated by actual use.[39] It is under no duty to devise some appliance better than any known appliance in practical use,[40] nor is it bound to purchase the patent for every invention claimed to be an improvement,[41] or to test[42] or to adopt[43] new and untried devices, or to adopt appliances which are mere experiments.[44] On the contrary, it has been said that the introduction of untried devices may of itself be negligence since the efficiency of appliances can only be demonstrated by actual experience and since adoption and use are the real tests of approval.[45] However, where an invention has been tested and has been approved as better than those a railroad company is using, it is required to adopt and use the better machinery.[46] In any event a company is not bound at once to introduce a new appliance which it is claimed will have the effect to make its locomotive safe in the respect mentioned. It is entitled to a reasonable time for trial and experiment, and to make the necessary changes.[47]

§ 491. Keeping Locomotives in Proper State of Repair

A railroad company must use ordinary and reasonable care to keep its locomotives and appliances in a condition of good repair, and it will be liable for any damages which result from a breach of that duty.

Railroad locomotives and their equipment must be kept in good order,[48] and a railroad company must use ordinary or reasonable care to keep its locomotives and appliances in a condition of good repair, and if it fails in this duty, and by reason thereof fire is communicated to property by sparks from its locomotives, it will be liable for the resulting damage.[49] However, the duty to keep locomotives and appliances in good repair does not require the highest degree of care,[50] it being sufficient if it uses ordinary care in that regard.[51] It will not be sufficient to relieve a company from liability for injuries by fire set out by its locomotive that it had employed a competent inspector,[52] or even that the locomotive and appliances had been inspected before sending them out on the road.[53] The fact that an engine became out of repair at a point on the line where there were no facilities for repairing will not justify the action of the engineer in running the engine with increased danger to the next repair shop instead of stopping at the next station.[54]

§ 492. Employment of Competent Servants to Operate Trains and Locomotives

A railroad company must employ competent and skillful engineers, firemen, or other servants to operate and manage its trains in order to relieve itself from liability for injuries caused by fire communicated from its locomotives.

In order to relieve itself from liability for injuries caused by fire communicated by its locomotives, a railroad company must employ competent and skillful engineers, firemen, or other servants to operate and manage its trains and locomotives,[55] but only such care in performing this duty is required as would be exercised by an ordinarily prudent person under all the surrounding circumstances.[56]

§ 493. Management and Operation of Locomotives and Trains

a. In general
b. Degree of care required
c. Fuel used
d Speed of trains

a. In General

A railroad company and its employees must use care in the management and operation of locomotives and trains, and the company is liable for damage caused by fire because of a failure to observe this requirement.

A railroad company, its engineers, firemen, and other servants must use ordinary care in the management and operation of locomotives and trains, and if property is injured or destroyed by the escape of fire by reason of their failure to observe this requirement, the railroad company will be liable for the resulting damages.[57] This is true although the railroad exercised due care in equipping the engine,[58] the locomotive was equipped with the most approved appliances for preventing the escape of sparks,[59] and although such appliances were in good order.[60] The rule applies with equal force to private steam railroads constructed for logging purposes.[61]

b. Degree of Care Required

The ordinary care required in the management and operation of locomotives and trains is the care which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise, and must be in proportion to the danger of inflicting injury.

The ordinary care required in the management and operation of locomotives and trains, which, as has been well said, is the only rule that can be stated by the court,[62] is the care which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under the same or similar circumstances.[63] It has been said to be a relative term,[64] and the care required necessarily depends on the circumstances of each particular case,[65] and must be commensurate with, or in proportion to, the danger to be apprehended of inflicting injury on the person or property of another.[66] What is care in one case may be negligence in another, where the danger is greater and more care is required.[67] Where the circumstances are such that the usual or customary way of operating locomotives is not a sufficient compliance with the duty to exercise due care to protect property, the company must exercise increased care accordingly.[68] However, even in times of excessive drought a company is not required to operate its trains so as absolutely to prevent all escape of fire from its locomotives,[69] and due consideration must also be given to the necessities of the railway service, and the duty of the company to its patrons and the public.[70]

In order to determine whether ordinary care has been exercised in the operation of a locomotive or train, the conditions prevailing at the time, such as the dryness of the weather,[71] the speed and direction of the wind,[72] the condition of the track and the nature of the freight carried,[73] the presence of combustibles on the right of way,[74] the dryness of the grasses, stubble, and other vegetation near the track,[75] the place at which the locomotive or train is being operated,[76] the proximity of buildings to the track,[77] especially when the buildings are of an inflammable nature,[78] and the inflammable character of other property near the track[79] must be considered.

c. Fuel Used

The law requires the exercise of ordinary or reasonable care by a railroad in providing proper fuel for use in its locomotives in order to avoid liability for damage from fires.

The law requires the exercise of ordinary or reasonable care by a railroad in providing proper fuel for use in its locomotives;[80] and this means such care in the selection and use of its fuel as a man of ordinary prudence, dealing with his own affairs and having a due regard for the rights and safety of others, would use.[81] However, a company is not bound to exercise more than ordinary care in the selection of fuel.[82] While the character of the fuel used may be considered in determining whether ordinary care has been exercised in the operation of a locomotive,[83] the law does not require railroad companies to use any particular kind of fuel in the operation of their locomotives.[84] It has, accordingly, been held that they may use coal,[85] whether anthracite[86] or bituminous,[87] wood,[88] or any other ordinary fuel,[89] unless such fuel is of a dangerous or hazardous quality,[90] subject to the limitation that the latest improvements in the management of the locomotives in practical use be used.[91]

Wood in coal-burning locomotive. While it has been held not negligent as a matter of law to use wood for fuel in a locomotive built to burn coal,[92] it has been held that if it is shown that the use of wood in a coal-burning locomotive materially increases the danger in setting fire to and burning adjacent property, the use of it constitutes negligence,[93] or at least that this is a fact to be considered in determining the question of negligence in the management of the locomotive.[94] It has also been held that the use of wood for fuel in a coal-burning locomotive, in which the meshes of the spark arrester are made much larger than where other fuel is used, is gross negligence where a high wind is prevailing at the time.[95]

d. Speed of Trains

The speed of the train is a factor to be considered in determining whether ordinary care has been exercised in the operation of a locomotive

While the speed of the train may be considered in determining whether ordinary care has been exercised in the operation of a locomotive,[96] where it becomes necessary to make up time between two points, the running of a train at a high rate of speed is not in itself negligence.[97] A railroad company is under no obligation to diminish the usual speed of its trains when passing isolated buildings near its track on dry and windy days since this is incompatible with the proper discharge of its duties as a common carrier.[98] However, it has been held that operating a locomotive at twice the rate of speed of its schedule may constitute negligence where the season was very dry and a strong wind was blowing directly toward the building to which the fire was communicated by the locomotive, and it did not appear that the speed adopted was a necessity to the railway service or a duty owing by the company to its patrons or the public.[99]

Speed in excess of that limited by statute or ordinance. Where companies run their trains through cities, towns, or villages at a speed greater than that limited by statute or ordinance, and by reason of such excessive speed fires are communicated by the locomotive to adjoining property which is injured or destroyed, the company is liable.[1]

§ 494. Combustibles on Track, Right of Way, or Other Property

It is the duty of a railroad to use ordinary or reasonable care and diligence to keep its track and right of way or other contiguous property reasonably free from combustible matter, and a railroad is liable for damage caused by fire as a result of a breach of this duty.

Independently of statute, it is the duty of a railroad company to use ordinary or reasonable care and diligence to keep its track and right of way or other contiguous property reasonably free from combustible matter likely to be ignited from sparks from passing locomotives and likely to communicate fire to the premises of others;[2] and this common-law rule has in some jurisdictions been either expressly affirmed or modified in some respects by statute.[3] If, in consequence of a company's negligent failure to comply with the common-law or statutory requirements, a fire occurs on its track, right of way, or other contiguous property, which is communicated to the property of another, it is liable for the resulting damages.[4]

A railroad company is not required to keep its right of way absolutely clear of combustible matter,[5] and it cannot be held liable if the quantity of combustibles was not sufficient to indicate danger from fire to common prudence and ordinary care.[6] The degree of care required of railroad companies in keeping their tracks, right of way, and other property reasonably free from combustible matter is ordinary or reasonable care,[7] which must be commensurate with, or in proportion to, the danger to be apprehended.[8] A company is required to use the same diligence in removing dry grass and weeds and other combustible materials from exposure to ignition by its locomotives that a cautious, prudent man would use with respect to combustible materials on his own property if exposed to the same hazard from such material,[9] and the degree of care in keeping the right of way free from combustibles is not to be measured by the usual conduct of other railroads.[10] If this required degree of care is used, the company is not guilty of negligence.[11]

The reason generally assigned for the rule requiring railroad companies to use ordinary or reasonable care and diligence to keep their tracks, right of way, or other contiguous property reasonably free from combustible matter is that it is impossible to operate a railroad without danger from fire,[12] even though locomotives of the most approved construction and with the best known appliances are in use and managed by the most skillful engineers and firemen,[13] and that the removal of the combustible substances is as much a means of preventing communication of fires to adjoining lands as the employment of the most approved and best constructed locomotives and appliances.[14] It has further been said that, inasmuch as railroad grants are to be strictly construed and not extended further than is properly required for the purposes for which the grant is sanctioned, no reason exists for conferring a privilege on railroad companies to the detriment of the owners of land along a railroad track to run their locomotives surrounded on their own premises by materials so combustible as to be in constant danger of being fired by such locomotives when running under ordinary conditions.[15]

Negligence per se. While it has very generally been held that it is not negligence per se for a railroad company to permit combustible matter, such as grass, weeds, etc, to grow or accumulate on its right of way,[16] it has also been held negligence per se to allow such material on the right of way where the duty to keep the right of way clear of such matter has been imposed on the railroad by statute.[17]

Effect of precautions in construction and management of locomotives. The fact that a company has used the proper precautions in constructing, equipping with proper appliances, and in managing its locomotives is immaterial and does not relieve it from liability if a fire started on its right of way by such a locomotive is communicated to adjoining property by reason of its negligence in permitting combustible material to accumulate along its roadway,[18] since two acts of negligence are not required in order to constitute a wrong,[19] and due care in one direction cannot excuse negligence in another.[20]

Combustibles placed on property by other agency In the absence of any statutory provision regulating the matter, it has been held that a railroad company is not liable because of an accumulation of combustible matter on its right of way likely to be the cause of injury if there through some other agency than its own and for so short a time that it had no notice of its presence, express or imputed from length of time, and no opportunity to remove it.[21]

Cause of fire. Dependent on the various statutes and the interpretations which have been made by the courts, a railroad has been held not to be liable for damage by fire because it failed to keep its right of way clear of combustible material unless the fire resulted from the operation of the railroad;[22] but, on the other hand, it has been stated that if the fire originates on the railroad's right of way in inflammable material, which has been allowed to accumulate there in violation of a statute, it is immaterial whether a spark from a railroad engine,[23] the act of a third person outside the railroad's right of way,[24] or any other cause started the fire.[25]

§ 495. Preventing Spread and Extinguishment of Fires

a. In general

b. Fires originating in conduct of business

c. Fires not originated by railroad

a. In General

A railroad is not relieved from liability for fires negligently started by it because the railroad uses proper or ordinary care in trying to extinguish the fire; but no matter how a fire starts, a railroad is liable if it negligently allows it to escape from the right of way.

The general rule is that a railroad is answerable for any injury sustained by a fire started by the negligence of the railroad even though it uses proper,[26] or ordinary care to quench the fire,[27] and no matter what efforts the servants of the railroad may use to extinguish the fire.[28] Where the fire originates on the right of way of a railroad and the railroad negligently allows the fire to escape, the railroad is liable,[29] independently of how the fire started, whether negligently or otherwise.[30]

The question of what would constitute such negligence as would render the railroad company liable for injuries by fire set out on its right of way depends on the circumstances as they existed at the time of the injury,[31] such as the distance of the property injured from the right of way,[32] the direction[33] and velocity of the wind,[34] the condition of the weather as to dryness or moisture,[35] and, in short, every circumstance attending the injury to the property.[36] The degree of care to be exercised by a railroad company in preventing the spread of fire or extinguishing it is ordinary or reasonable care, which is such care as would be exercised by a prudent person under like circumstances.[37] It has been held that a company is not obliged to keep men stationed along its right of way either to guard against or extinguish fires which may occur.[38] On the other hand, there is authority apparently to the effect that, in excessively dry seasons, it is the duty of the company to employ extra men to watch the right of way and assist in putting out fires.[39]

Liability of a company for failure of its employees to prevent the spread of or to extinguish fire exists only where the employees are not at the time engaged by the company in some duty from the company to the public,[40] and it has generally been held that, in the exercise of ordinary care to prevent the spread of fires or to extinguish them, it is not incumbent on the crews of passenger or freight trains to stop the trains and attempt to prevent the spread of or extinguish fires set out by the trains or otherwise, and that their failure to do so will not render the company liable for injuries to, or destruction of, property caused by such fires,[41] since this action would endanger the lives of passengers whose safety depends on trains complying with their schedules.[42] A different rule, however, has been laid down in respect of crews of gravel trains; and it has been held that, where a gravel train on which there is a large number of men starts a fire along the company's right of way and the servants in charge of the train know of the existence of the fire and fail to leave men to extinguish the flames, there is such negligence as renders the company liable for damages caused by the fire.[43]

b. Fires Originating in Conduct of Business

(1) On railroad's premises
(2) Off right of way

(1) On Railroad's Premises

If a railroad is negligent either in starting a fire on its premises or in preventing its escape it will be liable for injuries resulting from such negligence.

Since a railroad company has imposed on it a duty to use a reasonable degree of care and diligence to keep its right of way free from inflammable matter where fire from sparks may be communicated to the property of others, it has the right to keep its right of way clear of combustible material,[44] and it is not liable for damages resulting from the spread of fire from its property to adjacent property where it sets out the fire on its own premises for the purpose of cleaning its right of way from weeds, grass, etc., provided it uses reasonable care and prudence in setting it out and preventing its escape.[45] On the other hand, if the company is negligent either in setting out the fire, or in preventing its escape, or in both respects, it will be liable for injuries to property resulting from such negligence;[46] and, a fortiori, it is liable where the setting out of the fire is something more than culpable negligence and amounts to a positive wrong by reason of the surrounding circumstances.[47] Where, on account of the velocity of the wind, it is dangerous to attempt to burn off a right of way, it is the duty of the company, and not of the owner of adjacent property, to plough or burn fire guards to protect such adjacent property.[48]

Where a fire is started on a right of way or other premises of a railroad company by reason of its negligence in the operation of its trains,[49] or through other agencies used in the furtherance of its business,[50] and the fire spreads to adjoining property and injures it, the company is, of course, liable if it has failed to use ordinary care and diligence to prevent the spread of the fire to the adjoining property. It has also been held that it is liable, although it may have used ordinary care and diligence[51] to prevent the spread of the fire thus negligently started, the view being taken that negligent failure of the company to put out the fire when it could have done so adds nothing to its liability if it negligently started the fire.[52] However, there are decisions holding that, although a company negligently sets fire to its right of way and the fire spreads to adjacent lands injuring them, the company is not liable unless it was negligent in suffering the fire to so spread,[53] but the fact that the railroad men did all in their power to arrest the fire after it had spread beyond the railroad's right of way does not relieve the railroad of liability.[54]

Where a fire originates on a right of way, without negligence on the part of the company, through the operation of its trains,[55] or through other agencies used in the furtherance of its business,[56] reasonable care must be used to prevent the spread of the fire to adjoining property or to extinguish it if it reaches the property, and if it is injured or destroyed by reason of failure to exercise such care, the company will be liable for the damages sustained. Prior to a statute which makes a railroad liable for fire caused by its engines regardless of negligence, it was held that where a fire originating on a right of way was not caused by the company's negligence, failure of its servants, even though they had knowledge of the fire, to prevent its spread to adjoining premises would not render the company liable for the injury sustained.[57]

(2) Off Right of Way

It has been held to be the duty of a railroad company to use ordinary care to extinguish fires started without negligence on contiguous lands, although it has also been held that the company is under no such duty unless the fire was caused by the railroad's negligence.

According to some decisions, it is the duty of a railroad company to use ordinary care to extinguish fires started without any negligence on its part on contiguous lands, and a failure to exercise such care gives a right of action for any resulting injury.[58] On the other hand, it has been held that, where property near a railroad is set on fire by sparks from a locomotive, the company is under no duty to extinguish the fire if it was not caused by negligence.[59]

c. Fires Not Originated by Railroad

Where a fire for which the railroad is not responsible originates along its right of way, the railroad, if it knows, or is chargeable with knowledge, of the fire, must use reasonable care to prevent the spread thereof.

Where a fire is started on, or along, a right of way from no cause for which the company is responsible, if it knows, or is chargeable with knowledge, of its existence, it must use reasonable care to prevent the spread of the fire, and if it fails to do so, it will be liable for the resulting damages.[60] It has been held that a company is negligent where it knowingly permits hoboes to build camp fires along its right of way, and that it is liable for injuries caused by the spread of the fire to adjoining premises.[61]

(2) Intervening agencies
(3) Concurring negligence of third person
(4) Fire started by railroad uniting with fire of other origin

(1) In General

A railroad company is liable for damages caused by fire only where its fire or negligence is the proximate cause of the injury.

While it has been stated that proximate and remote cause is eliminated under statutes making railroads liable, regardless of negligence, for damage to property injured by fire communicated by engines or originating on the right of way,[62] a railroad company is liable for damages to property caused by fire only where its fire is the proximate cause of the injury; or in other words, where the injury is a consequence so natural that a reasonable person might or should have foreseen that it was likely to result.[63] The acts of the railroad, where negligent, must contribute to the injury which results from the fire,[64] and must not be too remote from the injury.[65] Merely furnishing a condition by which injury is made possible does not necessarily constitute the proximate cause of the injury.[66] It is sufficient if, at the time of the negligence, the wrongdoer might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have foreseen that some injury might result from his negligence.[67] It is not necessary that the particular injury and the particular manner of its occurrence could have reasonably been foreseen;[68] nor is it essential to liability that the injury inflicted should have been so certain to result from the company's negligence that a reasonable person could have foreseen that it would result, or that it would probably result;[69] it is enough if it be a consequence so natural and direct that a reasonable person might, and naturally would, see that it was liable to result from such negligence, that is, that it might follow.[70]

Where the progress of a fire negligently set out by a railroad company is continuous and the spread of it is not occasioned by any intervening cause, neither the distance traversed by the fire before it reached the property destroyed, and for which a recovery is sought, nor the time elapsing between the commencement of the fire and the destruction of the property, will prevent a recovery.[71] The word "proximate," it is said, as used in the term "proximate cause," means closeness of causal connection, and not nearness in time or distance.[72]

Where the use of backfires is reasonable and proper under the circumstances, the original fires started by the railroad become the direct, efficient, and proximate cause of all the fires, and, if the backfires cause the damage, the predominant cause of the damage is the original fire.[73] If the fire on the railroad's right of way escapes without negligence on the part of either the railroad or the landowner, the landowner's loss is the result of an unavoidable accident for which the railroad is not liable.[74]

Under statutes or ordinances regulating the speed at which trains may be run through cities, towns, or villages, the unlawful rate of speed must be the proximate cause of the injury, and a company is not liable for damages by reason of running its train at an unlawful rate of speed unless the fire would not have occurred except for such speed;[75] and also the failure to observe a statutory requirement with respect to checking the speed of a train at a public road crossing, while it is negligence as to injuries occurring on the crossing, is irrelevant in a suit for setting fire to adjoining property unless it is shown that the proximate cause of the fire was failure to check the train.[76]

(2) Intervening Agencies
- (a) In general
- (b) Spread of fire

(a) In General

If there is an efficient intervening agency between the act of the railroad and the final injurious result, the railroad will not be liable for damage to property by fire

If there is an efficient intervening agency between the act of the railroad company and the final injurious result, the company will not be liable.[77] If some new cause intervenes which is not the consequence of the first wrongful cause or under the control of the railroad,[78] and of such a character that it could not have been foreseen by the exercise of reasonable diligence by the company,[79] and except for which the final injurious consequence could not have happened,[80] the railroad will not be liable. A railroad is not liable for a fire started by some one else on its right of way merely because it could have foreseen that danger would result from such a fire because of the condition of the right of way,[81] but in order to render the railroad liable it must be able to foresee that such independent forces will probably, or are likely to, concur or intervene.[82]

(b) Spread of Fire
- aa. In general
- bb. Natural forces or agencies

aa. In General

In order to recover for injuries to property by fire set out by a railroad, it is not necessary that the fire should be directly communicated by the railroad to the property injured.

The general rule is well settled by the great weight of authority that in order to recover for injuries to, or destruction of, property by fire set out by a railroad company, it is not necessary that the fire should be directly communicated by the company to the property injured or destroyed.[83] A recovery may be had for the destruction of property by fire set out by a company on its own property and thence escaping to the property of an adjoining owner.[84] Generally, if the injury is one which might reasonably have been anticipated from the act of the company in permitting the fire to start or escape, and the fire burns as one continuous fire without a break in the line of causation, and without the aid of any independent agency, the injury, if traceable to the first fire, is a proximate consequence of the fire notwithstanding the fire has passed through the land or property of others before causing such injury.[85] It has been held that the propriety of the rule cannot be affected by considerations as to the extent of liability to which the railroads might be thereby subjected, even if the rule results in bankruptcy and compels them to suspend their operation.[86] If, however, the fire spreads beyond its natural limits by means of a new and independent agency, the loss is a remote consequence for which the railroad company is not responsible.[87] However, the view has also been taken that where a railroad negligently sets out a fire on its own premises, and the fire spreads to the land of an abutting owner, and is thence communicated to the lands of third persons which do not abut on the premises of the railroad, the railroad is not liable for damages to the property of such third persons, the view being taken that the injury is not the proximate result of the original fire.[88]

bb. Natural Forces or Agencies

The intervention of natural forces or agencies between the negligent act of a railroad in starting the fire and the injury to the property is not necessarily such an intervening cause as will relieve the railroad of liability.

The general rule is well settled that the intervention of natural forces or agencies between the negligent act of a railroad company in starting the fire and the injury to, or destruction of, property by fire so started is not such an intervening cause as will relieve the company of liability.[89] This principle applies although the force or agency is the law of gravitation,[90] and the fact that the fire which destroys the property is first set out in combustible matter in a state of nature on the property of the railroad company, or of plaintiff, or of a third person, and thence communicated to the property destroyed, is not such an intervening agency as to affect the liability of the company.[91]

Wind. The general rule is well settled that the wind is not to be regarded as an independent intervening agency so as to relieve a railroad company from its liability on the ground that its negligence is not a proximate cause of the injury.[92] The principle has been applied not only to winds of ordinary velocity,[93] but also to high winds which are not extraordinary or unusual at the time and place of the injury and might reasonably have been anticipated,[94] the view being taken that it is only strong winds which are unusual or extraordinary that may be regarded as an intervening cause.[95] Nevertheless, it has been generally held or said that, if the wind is of such an unusual or extraordinary character that the company could not have reasonably anticipated it, it must be considered an intervening cause, exempting the company from liability for the injury.[96] There are, however, decisions in which it is either held[97] or said[98] that the fact that the wind was of an unusual or extraordinary nature does not exempt the company from liability.

A change in the direction of the wind which was blowing at the time the fire was set cannot be considered as an intervening agency, so as to exempt the railroad company from liability if it was negligent in setting out the fire,[99] although it may have carried the result of the negligence further than it would otherwise have gone.[1] So, also, an increase in the velocity of the wind after the fire was set, if not of an extraordinary character, is not an intervening cause that will prevent recovery.[2]

Running water. While there is authority to the contrary,[3] the better view is that running water is not an independent intervening agency for carrying combustible matter, such as burning oil, which will relieve the company from liability,[4] the view being taken that, as an agency for the transmission of burning oil, it is just as certain and effectual in its operations as the wind in carrying flame, or a spark, or combustible matter in spreading a fire.[5]

(3) Concurring Negligence of Third Person

The fact that the negligence of a third person may have contributed to the injury to property is not a defense to an action against a railroad for injury to property caused by a fire negligently set out by the railroad.

In accordance with well settled principles, it is not a defense to an action against a railroad company for injury to, or destruction of, property by fire negligently set out by it that the negligence of one for whose acts the owner of the property injured or destroyed was not responsible may have contributed to the injury complained of;[6] and the fact that both the company and such stranger are each, on account of his own negligence, liable to plaintiff, is no defense to either the company or the stranger.[7] All of the legal consequences of being joint wrongdoers must follow, one being that each is liable to the full extent of the damages growing out of the wrongful acts.[8]

(4) Fire Started by Railroad Uniting with Fire of Other Origin

A railroad which negligently sets a fire is responsible for the damage done by it, although the fire is joined by a fire set by a third person, and the two concurrently do the damage, if it appears that the first fire would have done the damage alone.

A railroad company which negligently sets a fire is responsible for the damage done by it, although the fire is joined by a fire set by a third person, and the two concurrently do the damage, if it appears that the first fire would have done the damage without the assistance of the second fire.[9] So, also, where a company sets a fire and is negligent in failing to extinguish another fire not started by it, and allows it to escape and join the fire started by it, it is liable for the damages caused by the two fires, after they had joined.[10] Where a company is responsible for the origin of a fire which unites with another fire of equal rank and of unknown origin, but which it is morally certain was set by some human agency, and the combined fires destroyed plaintiff's property, the company is liable for the entire damages.[11] It has also been held that a company cannot escape liability for a fire negligently started by it by showing that the fire united with another of no responsible origin and that plaintiff's property was destroyed by the combined fires, if it appears that the fire started by the company was a material element entering into the destruction of the property,[12] but as to this a contrary view has been taken.[13]

In order that there may be a recovery for personal injuries caused by the setting out of a fire by a railroad company, it must appear that the negligence of the company was the proximate cause of the injury,[14] and if there is an independent intervening agency between the negligent act of the company and the final injurious result, the railroad will not be liable.[15]

Injury to infant

Where a railroad company sets fire to combustibles negligently left on its right of way and fire spreads to the front yard of a house adjoining the right of way and burns a child two years old playing in the yard, the negligence of the company is the proximate cause of the injury.—Greer v. Ill person injured by smoke

The fact that smoke and fumes caused by fire would have done no substantial harm to a person who was not ill does not preclude recovery for a railroad's negligence in allowing a fire to spread to a locality where the railroad should have anticipated that there were homes, some of which foreseeably contained ill persons.—Missouri Pac. Fusee left on right of way

Where small boys found a fusee on railroad's right of way and took it home, and smaller boy subsequently obtained the fusee and set it afire, with the result that it set his sister's dress afire, alleged negligence of railroad was not the "proximate cause" of the sister's injury and railroad was not liable.—Dabrowski v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 24 N.E.2d 382, 303 Ill.App. 31.

(a) Injury to Owner

Generally a person who acts with reasonable care and prudence may recover for personal injuries received in an attempt to save his property from a fire negligently caused by a railroad.

It has generally been held that a recovery may be had by reason of personal injuries or death sustained by persons attempting to put out fires communicated to their property through the negligence of railroad companies, where they have acted with reasonable care and prudence,[16] whether the injury resulted from actual contact with the fire[17] or from overexertion,[18] the view being taken that the negligence of the company is the proximate cause of the injury.[19] However, it has also been held that the act of the owner in attempting to save the property, and not the negligence of the company in setting out the fire, is the proximate cause of the injury,[20] and this is so whether or not the owner of the property is, himself, guilty of negligence.[21]

(b) Injury to Third Persons

While it has been held that a person may recover for personal injuries received in attempting to save the property of another from a fire negligently caused by the railroad, there is authority to the contrary.

While it has been held that a person may recover damages for personal injuries received in attempting to save the property of another from a fire caused by a railroad,[22] it has also been stated that a person who has no connection with the property is a volunteer, and cannot recover for injuries sustained while attempting to save the property of another from such a fire,[23] the person's voluntary act being the proximate cause of the injury.[24] It has also been held that no one should be permitted to recover for injuries sustained in attempting to save property of another from fire in the face of obvious dangers such as no reasonably prudent man would, under the circumstances, incur[25] A person who is not the owner of the property which he was attempting to save when he received a personal injury may recover if he were a resident on the property,[26] enjoyed some authority with respect to it,[27] was under a responsibility for the property,[28] or was an employee of the person whose property was endangered by the fire[29]

Fireman. A railroad company is not liable to a fireman extinguishing a fire set out by the railroad where his injury was not a proximate result of the fire,[30] and a railroad company has also been held not liable for personal injuries incurred by a fireman in extinguishing a fire negligently caused by the railroad because the railroad owes no duty to the fireman.[31] injury to, such property by fire negligently set out by a railroad company, if it is the proximate cause of the injury.

In the absence of statutes providing otherwise, contributory negligence constitutes a complete bar to a recovery for loss of, or injury to, property by fire negligently set out by a railroad company, if it is the proximate cause of the injury.[32] It has been held, however, that, where plaintiff's negligence increased the loss, he may still recover for the damage done, up to the time when the contributory negligence began to affect the result.[33] One whose property was burned in a warehouse in which he had stored it is not chargeable with the contributory negligence of the warehousemen in leaving highly inflammable property exposed on an uncovered platform which caught fire from the sparks of defendant's locomotive and in turn communicated the fire to plaintiff's property, destroying it.[34]

Assumption of risk. In the absence of a statute imposing liability on a railroad company for injury to property from fire set out by the railroad, even in the absence of negligence, as discussed supra § 485 et seq, the owner of property near a railroad assumes the risk of injury or destruction by fire incident to the position of his property, and cannot recover for losses sustained by fire being communicated to his property by the company due to unavoidable accident and without negligence on its part;[35] but he does not assume the risk of injury or destruction by fire caused by the negligence of the company or its servants.[36]

Injuries to person. As in the case of injuries to property, one who has sustained personal injuries in attempting to save his property from destruction by fire negligently set out by a railroad company cannot recover if he has been guilty of contributory negligence which is the proximate cause of the injury,[37] except where the rule has been changed by special statutory provision.[38]

b. Effect of Statutory Provisions

A railroad's liability under statutes imposing absolute liability on it for damages caused by fire started by its locomotives is generally not affected by contributory negligence on the part of the injured property owner unless his negligence is gross or such as amounts to fraud

A railroad company's liability under statutes imposing absolute liability on it for damages caused by fire started by its locomotives, as considered supra § 485 et seq, is generally not affected by contributory negligence on the part of the injured property owner.[39] However, an exception to this rule is very generally recognized where the contributory negligence is gross or such as amounts to fraud,[40] and the statutes of some jurisdictions make an express exception where the owner is guilty of contributory negligence in its ordinary meaning.[41] In other jurisdictions by express provision, contributory negligence is not a defense, but the damages recoverable are affected by the negligence attributable to plaintiffs.[42] Under statutes which go no further than to make the occurrence of fire prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the company, the defense of contributory negligence may be available to the railroad company.[43]

§ 498. —— What Constitutes Contributory Negligence in General

Generally, one who owns property near a railroad has the right to use it in the usual and ordinary way, although he is bound to use such care for its protection as a man of ordinary prudence would employ under like circumstances.

It is very generally held that one who owns property near a railroad has the right to use it in the usual and ordinary way, and in so doing is not chargeable with contributory negligence because he fails to anticipate and take unusual precautions to guard against negligence of the railroad company.[44] An owner of property is not limited in its use by its proximity to a railroad,[45] but may cultivate, build on, or use his land, or leave it in a state of nature, as he may see proper,[46] and, in so doing, will subject himself to no risks other than those which come from the careful operation of the road,[47] or unavoidable accident.[48] However, this rule does not protect a landowner who, with knowledge of negligently maintained menacing conditions on the railroad right of way, is guilty of identical, mutual, and concurring negligence;[49] the owner of the property is bound to use such care for its protection as a man of ordinary prudence would employ under like circumstances, but this is the limit of his duty,[50] and he will not be chargeable with contributory negligence for not doing an act which, if done, would have afforded no protection to his property from the fire.[51]

§ 499. —— Erecting Buildings or Other Structures on Land of Owner near Track

Although a landowner has the right to erect buildings near a railroad track for purposes for which they are suitable, he cannot, by the erection of such buildings, abridge the railroad's rights in the lawful use of its property.

In the exercise of his right to use his land in the ordinary and usual way the owner of land has the right to erect and maintain buildings and structures thereon near a railroad track for the purposes for which they are suitable, and in so doing is not guilty of contributory negligence,[52] although the danger of injury to his property by fire is thereby increased,[53] and he is aware of this fact,[54] but he cannot, by erecting buildings near the track, abridge the company's rights in the lawful use of its property.[55] He is not chargeable with negligence for failure to tear down or remove buildings erected before the railroad track was laid.[56]

Where one erects his building at a reasonably safe distance from the track, he cannot be held guilty of negligence because his building is so situated as to be liable to be set on fire by another subsequently erected in dangerous proximity to the track.[57]

§ 500. —— Care of Buildings on Owner's Property near Track

An owner of buildings near a railroad must exercise such care in the protection thereof as a man of ordinary prudence would employ under the same circumstances. A higher degree of care may be required of him than in the case of a person whose property is in a less exposed position.

While an owner of land has the right to erect buildings thereon near a railroad, he is nevertheless bound to exercise care in protecting such buildings as a man of ordinary prudence would employ under the same circumstances,[58] and it has been said that this would require a higher degree of care than in the case of a person whose property was in a less exposed position.[59]

The owner of a building in close proximity to a track is under no duty to keep watchmen to guard against fires negligently set out by a railroad company,[60] although the building is of wood,[61] or contains inflammable matter,[62] and although he knows that there is combustible matter on the right of way.[63] He has the right to assume that the company will perform the legal duties resting on it.[64] The owner of a warehouse near a track is not required to keep a fire hose in the warehouse to guard against fires set by sparks from the locomotives of passing trains.[65]

The mere failure to repair buildings or to put them in such shape as better to guard them against fire or to make them less liable to catch on fire does not constitute contributory negligence on the part of their owner.[66] It is not negligence for the owner of a residence near a railroad track to keep the windows thereof open when convenience or comfort requires it,[67] and, this being so, he is not chargeable with negligence in failing to mend a broken pane of glass in a window.[68]

With regard to unfinished buildings, barns, warehouses, and the like, containing combustible matter, it has been held that the owner of such buildings in close proximity to a track in which combustible material is stored in front of a window is not negligent in failing to guard against the communication of fires by keeping the window closed so as to exclude sparks.[69] However, it has been held that, where the owner of a warehouse located near a track and containing combustible matter leaves windows open so that fire from locomotives can be blown into the building, he is guilty of negligence.[70]

Permitting accumulations of combustible matter on, or around, buildings. While it has been held that one, who in building a house in close proximity to a track, permits shavings to lie around the house while it is being built is guilty of negligence,[71] it has also been held that carrying on the business of a cooper in a wooden building erected near a railroad and permitting shavings and other combustible materials to collect around them are not necessarily such negligence as will prevent a recovery for destruction by fire communicated by a locomotive.[72] The owner of a house near a track is not guilty of contributory negligence in allowing dry leaves to accumulate in a depression in the roof of the house.[73] One who allows combustible material to accumulate around his mill in close proximity to a track laid after his mill was erected is not guilty of contributory negligence.[74] In an action against a railroad by an abutting property owner for injury to his building by a fire allegedly set out by sparks from a locomotive of the railroad, the failure of plaintiff to remove combustible matter from his building may constitute contributory negligence.[75]

§ 501. —— Failure to Remove Combustibles from Owner's Land near Track

An owner of land near a railroad right of way is under no duty to remove from his land such combustible matter as dry grass, leaves, weeds, and the like, and is not chargeable with contributory negligence for failure to do so However, a land owner who is under a contractual duty to exercise care may not recover if he is guilty of contributory negligence.

The owner of land lying near or contiguous to a railroad right of way, in the exercise of his right to use his land in the natural and ordinary way for purposes to which it is suited, is under no duty to remove from his land such combustible material as dry grass, leaves, weeds, stubble, shucks, corn stalks, broom sedge, or brush, or the like, and hence is not chargeable with contributory negligence for failure to do so,[76] although his property may be extremely liable to take fire in case of negligent management of railroad trains.[77] He is not required to remove or destroy combustible matter in order to avoid the consequences of the possible, or even probable, negligence of the company.[78] It has similarly been held that allowing hay to lie on land used for growing it in windrows is only using the land in the ordinary manner and that the owner cannot be held guilty of contributory negligence in so doing because the land was near a railroad track.[79]

A plaintiff who is under a contractual duty to exercise care may not recover where he is guilty of contributory negligence,[80] but there can be no contributory negligence when no duty is placed on plaintiff to exercise care.[81] The owner of land adjoining a right of way is under no obligation to keep the grass cut on the right of way or to remove rubbish or other combustible material therefrom, although he owns the fee in the right of way.[82] Nevertheless, such an owner assumes the risk of fires set out by the company which are not due to negligence on its part, and for losses so sustained there can be no recovery.[83]

§ 502. —— Placing Combustibles on Land near Track

One whose premises adjoin a railroad is not chargeable with contributory negligence where he took out of doors and used on his premises an inflammable article necessarily used in his business on the premises. The piling of baled cotton by a landowner on his land near a track is not necessarily contributory negligence.

One whose premises adjoin a railroad is not chargeable with contributory negligence simply because he took out of doors and used on his premises an inflammable article necessary to be used in the business carried on on the premises,[84] or because he placed a canvas cover over plants growing on the land, although the cover was within reach of sparks from locomotives passing on the track.[85]

Cotton. It has been held that piling of baled cotton by a landowner on his land near a track is not contributory negligence,[86] although the cotton may be destroyed by fire caused by sparks emitted by a locomotive defectively constructed or improperly managed.[87] Where the owner of baled cotton in a gin spread out highly inflammable matter, such as lint cotton, on the gin platform, forty to fifty feet from a railroad track, he was held guilty of contributory negligence which would bar a recovery for the destruction of the baled cotton by reason of fire originally communicated to the lint cotton by a locomotive,[88] although the railroad employees were negligent in the operation of the locomotive.[89]

Stacks of grain, straw, or the like. In some decisions it has been said[90] or held[91] that a landowner who stacks grain, straw, or the like on his land near a track is not guilty of contributory negligence in so doing, although there is some authority to the contrary.[92] It has been held that it is not negligence per se to stack hay in an exposed position near a track.[93]

§ 503. —— Placing Property on Premises of Company

One who places property on the premises of a railroad company with the permission of the company assumes the risk of injury from fire due to accident, but in so doing he is not guilty of contributory negligence and may recover where the company is negligent in setting out the fire.

Where personal property is placed by its owner on the right of way or other premises of a railroad company with the express or implied permission of the company,[94] the owner assumes the risk of its being burned by unavoidable accident to which the nature of the placing renders it liable.[95] In such a case, it has been held that the owner was guilty of contributory negligence,[96] but in the majority of decisions it was held that the owner was not guilty of contributory negligence and was entitled to recover for injury to, or destruction of, the property by fire negligently set out by the company,[97] the measure of the company's obligation to avoid a negligent fire causing destruction of the property being precisely the same as it would have been if the owner of the property had placed it near to, but off, its premises.[98] These principles have been applied in cases involving specific types of property such as cordwood,[99]

lumber, timber, or crossties,[1] cotton,[2] and cotton seed.[3]

Buildings or structures. One who erects buildings or structures, wholly or partially, on a right of way or other property of a railroad with its consent, express or implied, is not chargeable with contributory negligence in so doing, and may recover for injury thereto, or destruction thereof, by fire negligently set out by the company,[4] unless the latter has contracted for exemption from liability for injury to the property as a condition of granting permission to erect and maintain such buildings or structures on its property.[5] However, even though there is a contract of this character, where buildings on the right of way are negligently set on fire by the company, and the fire extends to, and burns, other and adjoining property, it will not deprive the owner of his remedy for the negligent burning of the adjoining property.[6] It has been held, however, that the owner is bound to use reasonable care considering his relation to the company to protect his property in order to relieve himself from liability for contributory negligence[7]

Without permission of company. One who places property on the right of way or other premises of a railroad company without permission is a trespasser and is guilty of contributory negligence which will bar a recovery for its destruction by fire negligently set out by the company,[8] since one owes no duty to a trespasser, except not willfully or maliciously to injure him or his property,[9] and especially is this true where the owner of the property has been requested to remove it,[10] or where he is warned that if it remains it will be at his own risk.[11] This rule is not affected by a statute making railroad companies absolutely liable for property destroyed by fire caused by its locomotive.[12]

§ 504. —— Placing Combustible Property on Premises of Another Adjacent to Track

An owner of combustible property who placed it in proximity to a track on a platform which did not belong to the railroad assumed the risk of its destruction by sparks from a locomotive properly managed and equipped.

Where the owner of cotton without any agency of the railroad company placed it in proximity to the track on a platform which did not belong to the company, but to the municipal authorities of the town,[13] or to a compress company whose building was adjacent to the right of way,[14] the owner assumed the risk of its destruction by sparks from a locomotive properly equipped and managed, and the company was under no obligation to provide a watchman for the platform.[15] The negligence, if any, of a compress company in placing and leaving cotton on its platform near a railroad track as bailee of the owner of the cotton must be imputed to the owner thereof who placed it in charge of the compress company.[16] It was further held that, even though the cotton was placed on the platform of the compress company with the consent, acquiescence, or invitation, of the railway company, this fact did not relieve the owners of the duty to use proper care to protect it from fire,[17] or estop the railroad company to set out contributory negligence as a defense,[18] but a contrary view has been taken.[19]

§ 505. —— Failure to Construct Fire Breaks

Where a statute makes railroads liable for loss to property by fire set out by them irrespective of contributory negligence by the owner thereof, the owner of combustible property placed on his own land is under no duty to construct a fire guard around it. Where there is no statute of this type, the failure to construct fire guards is not necessarily contributory negligence.

Where a statute makes railroad companies liable for loss or injury to property by fire set out by them irrespective of contributory negligence on the part of the owner, the owner of combustible property placed on his own land near a track, such as haystacks and the like, is under no duty to construct a fire guard around it by burning, plowing, or otherwise [20] Where there are no statutes of this character, it has been held that failure to construct such fire guards is not contributory negligence,[21] at least in the absence of any custom or usage to do so in the locality where the fire occurred,[22] and it has been held that the failure to plow fire breaks around land adjacent to the railway on which cut hay is lying in windrows is not per se contributory negligence.[23] It is not negligence per se to fail to make fire guards around a field of shocked wheat one and one-half miles from the railroad.[24] The property owner has no duty to permit a railroad company to plough fire guards on his property.[25]

It has been held that refusal of the owner of land adjacent to a railroad of permission to the company to burn fire guards on his land, where it offered to pay for the grass burned as a fire guard as soon as the area of the same could be measured and the number of acres burned ascertained, except on an unreasonable condition that the company pay for damage in advance, is contributory negligence barring a recovery against the railroad for injuries to his land by fire set out by the railroad company.[26]

§ 506. —— Failure to Take Precautions after Commission of Negligent Act

An owner of property adjacent to a railroad, who knows of the commission of a negligent act by the railroad which may endanger his property, must take steps to avert the injurious consequence of such negligence or he will be guilty of contributory negligence which will bar a recovery for damages to his property by fire proximately flowing therefrom.

If the owner of property adjacent to a railroad right of way knows of the commission of a negligent act by the railroad company which may endanger his property, he must take steps to avert the injurious consequence of such negligence, or he will himself be guilty of contributory negligence which will preclude a recovery for damages to his property by fire proximately flowing therefrom.[27] Thus, where property is set on fire by the negligence of a railroad company, or is in danger of being set on fire by the spread of fire negligently set out by the company, the owner of the property, or his agents or servants engaged with respect to the care and management of the property, must, if they have knowledge of the fire, exercise ordinary care and diligence to extinguish it, and, if no effort is made to do so, the right to recover for loss or injury to the property is barred by contributory negligence.[28]

Measure of owner's duty; degree of care. The measure of duty imposed in attempting to extinguish fires is ordinary care and diligence,[29] that is to say, such precautions as a reasonably prudent man would be expected to take under the circumstances to protect his property from destruction.[30] The owner is not bound to adopt means to extinguish or prevent the spread of fire which are unreasonable or of extreme difficulty[31] or extraordinarily hazardous;[32] nor is he negligent in failing to attempt to extinguish the fire if his efforts would have been unavailing,[33] or if he makes a mistake of judgment as to the best method of extinguishing the fire,[34] or if he uses reasonable and bona fide efforts to stay the fire, which under the circumstances are ineffectual.[35] It has been held that the owner is not guilty of neglience in failing to extinguish a fire on the right of way where the fire was not of such a character as to impress a man of ordinary prudence with the belief that the danger to his property was immediate and pressing,[36] and that one, who spends his time in seeking to save a portion of his property from destruction by fire and in attempting to prevent the spread of such fire, is not, by reason of such conduct, guilty of contributory negligence in not having herded his cattle and placed them in a position of safety.[37]

Damages occurring before discovery of fire. Negligence of a property owner in failing to make an attempt to extinguish a fire negligently set out by a railroad company on his property will not defeat his right to recover for injury occurring before discovery of the fire.[38]

§ 507. —— Miscellaneous

The questions of contributory negligence and assumption of risk have been considered in various court decisions involving loss or injury to persons or property by a fire caused by a railroad in the operation of its locomotives.

Various decisions involving loss or injury to person or property by fires caused by the operation of locomotives in which the questions of contributory negligence and assumption of risk are considered have been handed down by the courts, as in the case where a landowner invited a railroad to operate one of its locomotives over tracks on his land for his benefit,[39] where a shipper failed to remove refuse or litter after loading railroad cars,[40] where the owner of land left combustible matter on land of another between his land and a railroad track,[41] where a child, while in its parents' home, was injured by fire escaping from a passing locomotive,[42] and where a special contract between the owner of a building and a railroad which built a siding thereto required the owner to exercise the greatest care in the management of the siding.[43]

§ 508. —— Contributory Negligence as Proximate Cause of Injury

Although a property owner is guilty of contributory negligence in respect of a fire caused by a railroad, he may recover for such injury as may have resulted unless his negligence was the proximate cause thereof.

The mere fact that a property owner is guilty of negligence in respect of the fire which causes his injury does not necessarily preclude him from recovering therefor on the ground of contributory negligence, but it must also appear that such negligence is the proximate cause of the injury, or in other words, that he has done some act or omitted some duty which is the proximate cause of the injury, either by contributing to the setting of the fire or to the damages resulting therefrom.[44] Nevertheless, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, if negligence of the owner is the proximate cause of the injury, the owner cannot recover, although the company may have been guilty of negligence in a greater degree.[45]

§ 509. —— Injury Avoidable notwithstanding Contributory Negligence

A railroad may be liable for injury to property notwithstanding the owner thereof negligently placed it in a position where it was in danger of catching fire from sparks of locomotives if the railroad discovered that the danger was imminent and could have avoided the injury.

Although an owner of property is guilty of negligence in placing it in a position where it is in danger of being set on fire by sparks from locomotives, the railroad company will nevertheless be liable for its destruction if it appears that it discovered the danger or could have done so by the exercise of ordinary diligence, that the danger was imminent, and that in the exercise of ordinary diligence in the circumstances it could have avoided injuring the property.[46] Nevertheless, this principle is applicable only where the danger is imminent, is discovered by the railroad company, and could have been avoided by it.[47]

§ 510. Contracts for Exemption from Liability

a. Validity
b. Construction, operation, and effect
c. Termination or renewal of contract

a. Validity

(1) In general
(2) Effect of statutory and constitutional provisions

(1) In General

A railroad company in its private capacity as owner of property may by a valid contract be relieved from damages by fire caused by its negligence.

While a railroad company may not contract for exemption, wholly or partially, from liability for damages caused by fire, in derogation of its duty to the public as common carrier,[48] the strict rule of liability for loss while acting as a common carrier is not applicable to all its activities,[49] and, in its private capacity as owner of property, it may, by a valid contract,[50] be relieved from liability for damages by fire caused by its negligence,[51] or for damages resulting from fire set by locomotives.[52] Accordingly, a railroad company may provide for such exemption as a consideration of permitting another to erect and use buildings[53] or store property[54] on its right of way, depot grounds, or other lands owned by it, provided the contract does not embrace property for the injury or destruction of which the company is liable as a common carrier; and this doctrine applies with equal force to similar contracts of a company leasing buildings owned by it adjacent to its track.[55] So, contracts under which companies construct industrial switches, spurs, or sidetracks, to serve industrial plants situated on property owned by others in consideration of exemptions therein contained from liability for loss by fires negligently caused by the companies, have likewise been held valid.[56] Inasmuch as a property owner may agree with a railroad, as an inducement to furnish him service over a spur track through his property, to refrain from acts which would make the operation unsafe,[57] a contract under which a property owner obtained such a spur track through his property and under which he agreed to permit no trash to accumulate on his track or premises is valid.[58]

Contract between owner of property and third person. A railroad company cannot take advantage of a contract of exemption entered into between the person whose goods are injured or destroyed and a third person whose warehouse is on the company's property, and in which the goods were stored at the time of injury.[59]

(2) Effect of Statutory and Constitutional Provisions

Contracts exempting a railroad company from liability for damages to buildings on its right of way from fire caused by its negligence are not invalidated by laws making carriers liable for damages irrespective of negligence, or generally prohibiting contracts by them in exemption of liability.

tracts by them in exemption of liability.[61] It has been held that such contracts are not in violation of a constitutional provision that "no common carrier shall be permitted to contract for relief from its common law liabilities"[62] Such contracts are valid where the railroad's duty as a common carrier is not involved.[63]

A railroad company may, when acting in its private capacity, relieve itself from an absolute liability imposed by statute for setting fire to property as well as from liability resulting from negligence,[64] and a statute requiring railroad operators to keep their rights of way free from combustible materials and imposing a liability for damages resulting from fire from operation of the road has no application to tenants on the right of way whose leases exempt the company from liability for damages for injury or destruction by fire or other causes incident to the operation of the railroad.[65] So, a contract between a railroad company and a private corporation whereby, in consideration of the latter's release of the railroad company from liability for fire, the company agreed to build and maintain a private sidetrack over its right of way and adjoining land for the private use of the corporation, is not invalidated by a statute imposing certain duties on railroad companies in respect of removing combustibles from their rights of way and putting out fires thereon and on adjoining lands, and providing a penalty, for any violation of its provisions[66] A provision in a lease of a railroad right of way which exempts the railroad as lessor from liability for damage by fire to the lessee's property on the leased premises is valid notwithstanding statutes imposing criminal liability on a railroad for failure to use safety appliances and absolute liability for fires set by locomotives.[67]

Expressly avoiding contracts for exemption Statutes making railroads liable for the negligent burning of buildings on their rights of way, notwithstanding provisions to the contrary in leases executed by them, have been upheld as a valid exercise of the police power.[68] Such a statute has been held to apply in a case where the lease was executed before the enactment thereof but the fire occurred thereafter.[69] It has been held also that the statute does not necessarily render the lease void in toto and that a clause in the lease, providing that, if the exemption therein provided for legally failed, the lessor should have the full benefit of any insurance effected by the lessee on structures erected on the premises, is valid and enforceable.[70]

(1) In General

Contracts providing for exemption from liability for fires caused by the railroad are construed against the party granting the contract. Such contracts operate as an absolute bar to the recovery of any damages included within their terms.

Contracts or leases providing for exemption from liability will be construed strongly against the lessor or party granting the contract,[71] although it will be construed in the light of the circumstances surrounding its execution[72] Such contracts operate as an absolute bar to the recovery of any damages included within their terms.[73] Thus a lease wherein the lessee covenanted to save the lessor-railroad harmless from claims for damages caused by fire from locomotives or from any other cause whatsoever did not, under the "ejusdem generis" rule, exempt the lessor from liability for fire damages caused by locomotives only, but covered all fire damages.[74] A property owner who negligently permits an accumulation of rubbish about a spur track on his property in violation of a contract with the railroad will be barred from recovery for fire damages caused by the negligence of the railroad but originating in such rubbish accumulation.[75] A covenant for quiet enjoyment in such a lease is subject to the provision saving the lessor harmless from all claims for damages caused by fire.[76] A recovery against the railroad was denied notwithstanding an additional clause in the agreement permitting the railroad to use the spur track for its business but not to the detriment of the lessee's business.[77]

Contracts or leases of this type, however, do not absolve from liability for gross, willful, and wanton negligence in failing to extinguish fires negligently set out,[78] or where the railroad willfully refused to unlock a railroad crossing so as to permit fire apparatus to pass thereby preventing such fire apparatus from reaching the leased property which was on fire.[79] Also the contract has been held not to release the railroad from liability for loss by fire resulting from tortious use of the tracks covered in the contract.[80] Where a statute makes railroads liable for damage resulting from fire caused by acts of any of their employees engaged in the course of their employment, a contract wherein the lessee agrees to indemnify the railroad against damage to property of the lessee arising from fire caused by locomotives of the railroad does not relieve the railroad from liability for loss from a fire started by its employees.[81] A contract between a railroad and its tenant leasing a right of way for warehouse purposes does not operate to relieve another railroad which is a joint tort-feasor with the lessor railroad with respect to a fire in the warehouse.[82]

(2) Who Bound by Contract

A provision for exemption from liability for loss by fire caused by negligence of the railroad is a covenant running with the land, and an assignee of a lease containing such a provision is bound thereby. Generally, provisions for exemption from liability for loss by fire due to negligence of the railroad companies embodied in contracts or leases are not binding on third persons who store goods on premises which are the subject of such contract or lease, but an assignee of the lease has generally been held bound thereby.

While there is some authority to the contrary,[83] generally provisions for exemption from liability for loss by fire due to the negligence of railroad companies embodied in contracts or leases are not binding on third persons whose property was stored on the premises which were the subject of the lease or contract, and do not prevent a recovery for injury to, or destruction of, such property by fire.[84] This is so whether they had notice of such provisions[85] or not,[86] the question of notice of the exemption being immaterial as a matter in which third persons have no interest.[87] It is likewise of no importance that the company had no notice that the property of the third person was stored on the premises,[88] or that he was a stockholder in the corporation which had leased the premises.[89]

Mortgagee of goods in building on leased premises. Where the lessee of railroad property under a lease exempting a railroad company from liability for injuries caused by fire due to its negligence erected a building on the demised premises and gave a chattel mortgage on its stock of goods therein and the mortgagee had no notice either actual or constructive of the lease of the exemption, it was held that the exemption should be construed merely as a contract of indemnity whereby the lessee was to protect the company from all claims, and, therefore, the mortgagee, not knowing of the covenant, might recover, where the mortgaged property was burned through the negligence of the company.[90]

Assignee or subtenant. It has been held that an assignee is not bound by a contract or lease provision for exemption from liability, the view being taken that it is a personal covenant and not a covenant running with the land,[91] but it is generally considered that the exemption is a covenant running with the land and that the assignee of the lease is bound thereby,[92] although the assignee had no actual notice of the provision for exemption.[93] Where an assignee of a lease in which the original lessee assumed the risk of damages because of fire from railroad operations assumes the liabilities of the lessee, such assignee will be barred from recovering for fire damages.[94] An assignment of a lease with the consent of the railroad is not a new lease as affecting the validity of the provision exempting the railroad from liability for damages to buildings on the leased premises.[95]

Where a lease of a warehouse on a right of way which exonerated the railroad from damages for fires, and gave the tenant, his successors or assigns, an option to continue the lease for another term of ten years on giving notice sixty days prior to its termination, was assigned to another, who continued in possession after the expiration of the term, and four months thereafter notified the company that, as assignee of the lease, he held possession under the terms of the lease for another period of ten years, the assignee was bound by the covenant of exoneration, even though that covenant was, prior to the expiration, merely personal, and not binding on the assignee, since he had not exercised his option of renewal in the time limited, and the consent of the railroad to another term thereafter was sufficient consideration for his agreement to hold under the terms of the lease.[96] It has been held, however, that, where one who purchased a building on ground leased from a railroad under a lease which exempted the company from liability for fire and provided against assignment without consent of the lessor was informed that a new lease was necessary and to have the old lease canceled, which was done, and where the company notified him that he was occupying without lease, he did not become a tenant under the lease and the company was liable for destruction of the property by fire caused by sparks from its locomotive.[97]

Subtenant. Since there is privity neither of contract nor of estate between the lessor and the sublessee unless the sublessee attorns to the original lessor, as discussed in Landlord and Tenant § 48, it has accordingly been held that a subtenant of a lessee of a railroad company under a lease exempting the company from liability for injuries for fire caused by its negligence is not bound by such exemption.[98] However, a contrary view has been taken holding that the subtenant is bound by the exemption,[99] whether or not he had actual notice of it.[1]

(3) Property Subject to Exemption

Whether or not the exemption extends to property outside the demised premises depends on the provisions of the particular lease and the construction placed thereon by the courts.

Whether or not the exemption extends to property outside the demised premises depends on the provisions of the particular lease and the construction placed thereon by the courts, so that it has been held that particular provisions exempt the railroad from liability for damage to property outside of the premises,[2] while it has also been held that particular provisions in other leases do not exempt the railroad company from liability for loss by fire communicated by locomotives except as to property situated on the right of way.[3] The word "buildings" in a lease refers to any buildings on the leased premises no matter when they were constructed.[4] The exemption does not extend to property of the lessee which, although on the leased premises when destroyed by fire, had passed into the custody and control of the railroad company.[5]

(4) Origin of Fire as Affecting Exemption

Whether or not a fire causing the loss complained of is of such origin as will confer exemption from liability on the railroad depends on the particular terms of the contract.

Whether or not the fire causing the loss or injury complained of is of such origin as will confer exemption from liability on the company whose negligence started the fire depends on the terms of the particular contract or lease.[6] Since the exemption is frequently contained in contracts for the construction of side tracks or spur tracks to serve industrial plants situated near the railroad, it often becomes necessary to determine whether the exemption extends to loss or injury by fire started on the main track as well as by fire started on the side track or spur track, and, as in other cases, whether or not the exemption extends to fire started on the main track depends on the wording of, and the construction put on, the particular contract creating the exemption.[7]

c. Termination or Renewal of Contract

Where a contract under which exemption from liability is claimed has expired, it ceases to be available in favor of the railroad company. A lease of this type, with no fixed date for termination, is a continuing contract.

Where the contract under which exemption from liability is claimed has expired, it ceases to be available in favor of the railroad company.[8] However, where the lessee, after terminating the lease by serving notice in accordance with its provisions, continues to occupy the leased property, he is bound by a provision in the lease that the company shall not be liable for fires caused by its locomotives,[9] and, where a lessee who is notified by the railroad to move a building off its premises does not do so and continues to pay the annual rent as provided for in the lease, the provision in such lease exempting the railroad for liability from loss due to fire is not canceled,[10] but it has been held, under an expired lease for a spur track not seasonably renewed, that the company cannot claim exemption from liability,[11] especially where the lessee has not used the spur track since the expiration of the lease.[12]

Where a lease creates a year-to-year tenancy, with no fixed date for termination, it is a continuing contract and a new lease does not come into existence at the beginning of each year.[13]

§ 511. Persons Entitled to Damages

a For injuries to person
b. For injuries to property

a. For Injuries to Person

A person injured by a fire caused by the negligent operation of a railroad generally may recover damages from the railroad A trespasser cannot recover for injuries from such a fire.

Generally, a person injured by fire caused by negligent operation of a railroad may recover damages from the railroad[14] A person cannot recover for personal injuries sustained from a fire caused by a railroad where such person is a trespasser on railroad land and where his presence was not known to servants of the railroad.[15]

b. For Injuries to Property

(1) In general
(2) Holders of legal or equitable title
(3) Persons having possession
(4) Landlord and tenant
(5) Licensees

(1) In General

General or special ownership of property is essential to authorize a recovery for its negligent destruction by fire by a railroad company.

Either general or special ownership of property is essential to authorize a recovery for its negligent destruction by fire by a railroad company.[16] Separate actions for damages caused by a railway fire cannot be maintained by both the owner and an insurance company which paid part of the loss.[17]

One who willfully permits a fire started by a railroad locomotive to destroy his property may not recover against the railroad[18] An owner of real or personal property damaged by fire caused by locomotive sparks cannot recover for damage to that part of such property which encroached on railroad lands.[19]

Assignor or assignee of claim for damages One who has assigned his claim for loss by fire from a locomotive to his insurer on receiving full insurance cannot maintain an action for such damages against the railroad company,[20] but he may recover for loss or injury to uninsured property[21] and for another's claim assigned to him under a statute empowering the court to give judgment for or against one or more of several claimants of defendant when justice requires it and to determine the parties' rights as between themselves.[22]

(2) Holders of Legal or Equitable Title

The holder of the legal title to land, as well as a holder of equitable title, may sue for injury to his land by fire caused by negligence of a railroad.

One who has absolute title to land may sue for injury thereto by fire negligently set out by a railroad company,[23] but one who has conveyed land has no right of action for injuries of the character under consideration.[24] One who has the equitable title to land[25] or personal property[26] may maintain an action for the negligent injury or destruction thereof by fire due to the negligence of a railroad company, and such right of action exists independently of an assignment to him of the right of action by the holder of the legal title at the time of the fire.[27]

(3) Persons Having Possession

Constructive, as well as actual, possession of property is sufficient to sustain a suit for a recovery for injury to such property by fire caused by negligence of a railroad. One who has neither title nor possession may not maintain such a suit.

Persons having actual possession of property, real or personal, under claim of title, are prima facie entitled to recover for injury to, or destruction of, such property by fire caused by the negligence of a railroad company, and, in the absence of evidence showing an outstanding adverse title to the property, may recover the resulting damage.[28] Such possession will authorize a recovery not only of damages to the land itself, but also damages for injury or destruction of crops, fences, etc.[29] One who has possession of personal property and a lien for work and labor expended on it has such an interest in the property as will entitle him to maintain an action for its negligent destruction by fire.[30] One who has possession as a bailee with license to use the property as long as he desires to do so may recover for injury to the property.[31]

Persons having constructive possession. In order to authorize a recovery for injury to land by fire negligently set out by a railroad company, actual possession of the land by plaintiff, otherwise entitled to recover, is not necessary, constructive possession being sufficient[32]

Persons having neither title nor possession of the property injured or destroyed have no right of action for damages for the destruction or injury of the property[33]

(4) Landlord and Tenant

A landlord whose property is in the possession of a tenant may sue for injury thereto by fire caused by negligence by a railroad. A lessee, as well as a sublessee, may recover for injuries to his property caused by fire due to negligence by the railroad.

Within the rule permitting one in constructive possession of land to recover for injury thereto, or destruction thereof, by fire, possession of a tenant is constructive possession of his landlord.[34] Accordingly, it has been held that an owner of cars leased to a railroad company may maintain an action for their negligent destruction by fire.[35] However, in the absence of exceptional circumstances,[36] a landlord cannot sue for the destruction of grass growing on the leased premises[37] or for destruction of a building on the leased premises owned by the lessee and not by himself.[38]

A tenant occupying under a lease may recover the value of grass on the leased land negligently destroyed by fire,[39] even though the lease is a verbal lease for more than a year and consequently invalid.[40] A lessee may recover for injury to, or destruction of, a building[41] or nursery stock[42] placed on leased land by the lessee under an agreement that it may be removed by him It has been held that, where by the terms of the lease the lessee is bound to rebuild buildings which have been burned, the lessee of property on which the buildings burned are situated is entitled to recover full damages for the destruction of the buildings.[43] A tenant from year to year has the right to recover for the destruction by fire of growing crops.[44] A tenant at sufferance may recover for injuries by fire negligently set out to the extent of the damage to his possessory interest.[45]

Right of sublessee. Where a lumber company owning houses occupied by its employees permitted an employee to sublet the house, the sublessee was not a trespasser and she may recover for the destruction of her household goods by fire negligently communicated by defendant's locomotive.[46] It has been held that, although parties are sublessees of a building, contrary to the terms of a lease held by the lessee from a railroad company, the company will nevertheless be liable to them for goods consumed by fire communicated to the building by the company.[47]

(5) Licensees

One who acquires property under a license may sue for its destruction by fire negligently set out by a railroad

One who under license, express or implied, cuts hay on the land of another,[48] or on public lands of the United States,[49] is the owner thereof, and may maintain an action for its destruction by fire negligently set out by a railroad company.

c. Defenses
d. Parties

a. In General

Jurisdiction, venue, and limitations in actions to recover for injuries by fires set out by railroad companies may be, and frequently are, regulated by statute.

Where a statute so provides, a railroad company may be sued in an action of debt for injuries to property caused by fire communicated from its locomotives, cars, or other vehicles.[50] An action for damages resulting from the burning of buildings by fire started by hobos in a railroad's freight cars standing on a siding has been held to be a tort action based on negligence or want of due care.[51] Jurisdiction and venue in such actions may be, and frequently are, regulated by local statutes.[52] Statutes of limitations specially applicable to such actions have been enacted in some jurisdictions[53]

general rules or statutes governing service of process on corporations usually apply in actions against a railroad company for damages by fire.[54] In actions based on statutes to recover for injuries to property by fire communicated by locomotives, no prior notice of claim for damages and demand for payment is necessary[55] except where the statutes contain requirements to that effect.[56]

b. What Law Governs

Where the fire which originated from the operation of the railroad and caused the damage occurred in another state, liability therefor is governed by the law of that state and not by the law of the state where the action is brought.

In accordance with general principles, where the fire which originated from the operation of the railroad and caused the damage occurred in another state, liability therefor is governed by the law of that state and not by the statute of the state where the action is brought,[57] and, it not appearing that there is any statute in that state affecting the question, the rights of the parties must be determined by the common law of that state,[58] which, in the absence of proof to the contrary, must be assumed to be the same as that of the state where the suit is brought.[59] Where property located in one state is burned by reason of a negligent act committed in another state or country, the cause of action is governed by the laws of the state where the property was situated,[60] but, while the railroad company may be liable under the common law as administered in the state where the property destroyed was located,[61] it is not liable under a statute in such a state where the legislature did not intend the statute to apply to such a situation;[62] nor does the fact that the company is authorized by the legislature to operate a railroad in the state and does so operate one change the result, since at the time of the fire it was not exercising its corporate authority under the laws of the state, but under the laws of a foreign jurisdiction.[63]

c. Defenses

Various matters have been held to constitute or not to constitute valid defenses to actions to recover for damages from fires caused by railroad companies.

A conveyance of lands to a railroad company for railroad purposes,[64] or their condemnation for that purpose,[65] does not bar the right to recover damages for injuries to the remainder of the land caused by fire negligently communicated to it from defendant's locomotives. A railroad company cannot set up against the claim of plaintiff for the injury done to him an alleged assignment to a third person who does not appear and has given no notice of claim of ownership of the cause of action.[66] A railroad company cannot avoid liability, because a section foreman paid no rent, for negligently burning his goods in a section house, if the company was benefited by his occupying it to board section hands.[67] Where a company has allowed inflammable houses occupied by its tenants to be constructed and maintained on its own land adjoining its track, the fact that at the time of the fire it had served them with notice to quit is not a valid defense to an action for injuries from the fire caused by the negligence of the company in the operation of its locomotives.[68]

The fact that the property was insured and that plaintiff has been paid the insurance is generally no defense to a railroad company in an action against it for negligently burning it;[69] but a contrary view has also been taken.[70] A statute of limitations, applicable to the action, is a good defense.[71] However, where there are separate causes of action arising at different times, the fact that one of them is barred by the statute of limitations does not affect plaintiff's right as to the others.[72]

d. Parties

All persons having an interest in the property may join in a suit to recover for the injury resulting from a fire caused by a railroad.

All persons having an interest in the property may join in a suit to recover for the injury or destruction resulting from a fire caused by a railroad.[73] If the property was insured and the insurance has been paid, but the value of the property destroyed exceeds the amount paid, insured may, and should, sue the railroad company in his own name for the full amount of the loss,[74] but the insurance company, if it has taken an assignment of the insured's cause of action, may be properly joined as plaintiff.[75] Under a statute requiring all actions to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, the bailee of property destroyed by fire, who merely claims that the owner is looking to him for the price of the property, has no such interest as will authorize an action for damages in his name alone.[76] A lessee of part of a right of way is not a necessary party to an action by his subtenant, who did not assume the lessee's covenants, to recover from the company damages sustained by fire set out by the company.[77] In an action by the holder of the equitable title to land injured by fire set by defendant's locomotive, the making of the holder of the legal title a party defendant is not objectionable for misjoinder of parties.[78]

§ 513. Declaration, Petition, or Complaint

a. In general
b. Negligence or breach of duty
c. Negativing matters of defense
d. Amendments

a. In General

The declaration, petition, or complaint in an action to recover for injuries resulting from fire set out by a railroad need not specify the particular train or engine which started the fire, but it should allege the time of the occurrence of the fire, give a description of the property injured, aver the plaintiff's ownership, and describe the nature and character of the injury and damages sustained.

In an action to recover for injuries resulting from fire set out by a railroad company, the complaint or statement need not specify the particular train or engine which started the fire,[79] but plaintiff should, if possible, identify in his pleading the train which caused the injury,[80] so that defendant may be able to identify the engine and investigate its condition and the conduct of its agents and servants at the time of the injury.[81] However, the identification of the train is not always necessary.[82]

The declaration, petition, or complaint should allege the time of the occurrence of the fire which caused the injury complained of,[83] in order to enable defendant to prepare his defense.[84] With respect to particularity of averment, it has been held that the particular date on which the fire occurred should be alleged,[85] and that it is not sufficient to allege that the fire occurred in a designated month,[86] or "on or about" a designated date,[87] although there is also authority to the contrary of this last proposition.[88]

The complaint should describe the property injured or destroyed[89] and aver plaintiff's ownership.[90] It must describe the nature and character of the injury and damages sustained with a reasonable degree of definiteness and certainty.[91] It has been held, however, that it is not necessary to allege the value of each particular item destroyed if the injuries done and the damages sustained are substantially shown.[92]

In an action to recover for injuries by fire set out by a railroad company based on a statute making all railroad companies liable for such injuries, whether or not common carriers, it is not essential to allege that defendant is a common carrier.[93]

A declaration is defective which fails to allege with requisite precision the facts which will place the action outside the terms of a contract for exemption from liability.[94]

Where the common-law right of action for injuries by fire negligently set out by a railroad company is not abrogated by statutes making such companies liable for injuries of this character irrespective of negligence, it has been held that it is not permissible to join in one count a common-law cause of action for negligence with a cause of action based on the statute.[95]

b. Negligence or Breach of Duty

(1) In general
(2) Defects in, or mismanagement of, locomotives
(3) Combustible matter on right of way
(4) Spread of fire

(1) In General

The declaration, petition, or complaint in an action for injuries resulting from fire set out by a railroad must allege a legal duty on the part of the railroad company, a breach of that duty which was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, and the particular act or omission relied on as a ground for recovery.
